HOW TO SAVE MONEY WHEN SHOPPING

By MRS. HARLAND H. ALLEN

(©, 1922, Harland H. Allen.)

BROOM TIPS

When buying a broom, grasp the handle firmly in one hand and try to twist the brush with the other. You can tell in this way if the brush is loose on the handle. If it is not pretty solid, do not buy it.

It never pays to buy cheap brooms or brushes. Always choose corn brooms with long fiber, tough and brittle; otherwise they will soon break to pieces. Select one made of such good corn that there are no seeds. Green-colored, soft broom-corn fiber wears longer, but the mere fact that it has a tendency to redness may not be objectionable. There are many grades of broom-corn, which is grown in several parts of the Middle West, and used for this purpose alone. Only the top part of the stalk and head are made into brooms. Manufacturers refer to the many grades as "Green hurl corn," "Medium quality hurl," "Sound-good-common," "Dwarf corn for whisks," "Common red tipped insides and covers," "Stained and damaged."

The process of making brooms is very simple, and are still made by hand, especially in prisons and penitentiaries. First the corn is sorted into equal lengths, bleached, and dried. It is then placed around the end of the stick and fastened with the wire; this is done by a winding machine. The broom is now a conical shape and must be flattened out in a vise. It is then sewed by hand, or by power, with stout twine, after which the brush is run through a scraping machine to remove any seeds left on the corn. There is left but the trimming, and the placing of the little plush or velvet guards over the wiring which is omitted in the cheaper grades—and the brooms are ready to be labeled and bunched into dozens for the market.

A new broom should always be dipped in hot salt water. This toughens the bristles. Frequent washing in hot soapy water will keep them soft and pliable, and lengthen the wear. Brooms should be hung up, as the brush is soon ruined by standing on the floor. Keep the ends cut off, so the bristles will wear evenly. When the broom begins to "spread," bind the bristles tightly together about half way down, using wire, or even a very strong cord. You will be surprised how much longer your brooms will last with a little such care.

Rank Health With Three "Rs" Is Plea

By MARIE K. JOHNSON

Marie K. Johnson.

As an educational subject for children, health should hold equal rank with the three "R's" in the curriculum of public schools. Doctors declare that without a healthy, sturdy body it is impossible for the child to have a healthy, happy mind.

Neglect of childhood defects may result in permanent physical impairment later on. Many childhood ills are traceable directly to malnutrition.

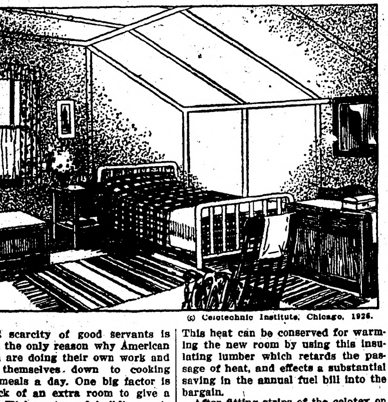
High school students especially need a variety in foods for at this age their growth is rapid. The protein or "building food" should be abundant for high school boys and girls. When they buy their luncheons, high school pupils are apt to display a preference for chocolate sodas, cream puffs and candy. An appetizing luncheon put up at home is much to be preferred to the sort the boy or girl might obtain at the corner store near the school.

Meat is all right for the school luncheon but it should be put up in tempting form. If sliced thin it is more appetizing in sandwiches than if in thick pieces. Beverages or soup may be carried in thermos bottles but the bottles must be carefully washed and aired daily after using.

Milk is recommended for an important place in the boy's or girl's diet because of its proteins, minerals, phosphorus and calcium, necessary for the development of the body and in the case of calcium and phosphorus for the building of bone and teeth. Evaporated milk has come into favor as a health builder for children as well as adults because by removal of 60 per cent of the water it is rendered more than twice as rich in food value as ordinary milk and by a process called homogenizing more digestible than bottled market milk.

Crisp lettuce and celery, carefully washed and dried, may be so wrapped in oil paper that they will be fresh and in good condition at lunch time. Lettuce should not be used in sandwiches for wilted lettuce is almost indigestible.

Attic for Maid Solves House Problem



(c) Celotechnic Institute, Chicago, 1926.

THE scarcity of good servants is not the only reason why American women are doing their own work and tying themselves down to cooking three meals a day. One big factor is the lack of an extra room to give a maid. High rents and building costs have brought about an era of small, compactly planned houses in most of which there is no room at all for a maid or else it means giving up a coveted guest or sewing room. Furthermore, many families would rather do without service than to give up their feeling of privacy, which having a maid in such small quarters would destroy.

Making a maid's room out of the unused attic is one satisfactory solution to the problem. At slight expense a small, attractive little room may be fixed up which would please any girl and it will be sufficiently removed from the rest of the house to assure privacy to the family and to the maid.

One would have to engage an Eskimo in the winter and a Fiji Islander in the summer to live in the wasted space between the second floor and the roof, unless it were properly and scientifically insulated. This is a simple matter for the attic of even an old house, by sealing the rafters with one or preferably two layers of cane fiber insulating lumber. Heat of course rises from the floors below and ordinarily escapes through the roof. This heat can be conserved for warming the new room by using this insulating lumber which retards the passage of heat, and effects a substantial saving in the annual fuel bill into the bargain.

After fitting strips of the celotex on all sides where the rafters meet the floor joists, the boards are nailed to the under side of the rafters and to the side walls. This surface makes a plaster base or, equally attractive, is left untreated, simply covering the joints with molding strips.

A closet can usually be built in, depending upon the shape of the room, or shelves may be put up, covered with cretonne curtains, and fitted with hooks and rod. The cubby-holes under the eaves may also be lined with the insulating lumber and used for housing trunks, screens or other storage articles. If a flue cannot be run from the furnace or heating plant, a small stove, or gas, oil or electric burner will supply the additional heat needed.

The furniture for such a room is of course very simple and inexpensive. A little enamel paint will do worlds to make old, chipped bedsteads and old-fashioned furniture sets look attractive. Light curtains should be used because the windows in such a room are apt to be small.

The man of the house if he is handy can extend a small wire from below with a buzzer attached for calling the maid in an emergency.

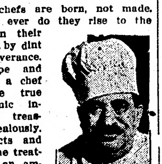
Khedive's Ex-Chef Gives Cooking Tip



H. Gedojian.

Great chefs are born, not made. Rarely if ever do they rise to the heights in their profession by dint of perseverance. In Europe and the East a chef with the true gastronomic instinct is treasured jealously. He expects and obtains the treatment of an ambassador. His dishes are the pride of his master, to be boasted of to friends in the cafes and bazaars.

Such a chef is Haroutoun Gedojian, sometime chef to the family royal of the khedive of Egypt, now the owner of a bizarre gold coast restaurant in Chicago. In his forty-three years as a chef extraordinaire, Haroutoun's word has been law in the cuisines of three Egyptian princes and one princess, the mother of the khedive. When Lord Kitchener was sirdar of Egypt, before the trouble in the Soudan, Haroutoun cooked for him.

One of Kitchener's favorite dishes, according to Haroutoun, was schischkabb, a dish made from milk-fed baby lamb. Prince Jamiel, another of his masters, was particularly fond of dried cream and honey, a preparation which is one of Haroutoun's zealously guarded secrets. Prince Saad Pasha was a keen admirer of a confection Haroutoun makes entirely out of flour, butter and nuts.

In many of his admirable dishes, Haroutoun uses evaporated milk, which is simply fresh cow's milk sterilized in cans and with sixty per cent of the water removed. Because of a homogenizing process through which evaporated milk is put, the fat globules in the milk are broken up into microscopic particles and distributed throughout the milk, where they remain in homogeneous suspension.

This breaking of the fat globules gives a distinct buttery flavor to every drop of the evaporated product, a flavor which ordinary market milk does not have. Haroutoun says he uses evaporated milk in preference to market milk in the preparation of all sorts of baked dishes, as well as in cooking.

SELECTING THE MATTRESS

A good mattress is looked upon by most people as a luxury, but nothing is more essential to restful sleep, and the extra expense should be regarded as a profitable investment.

Size, filling, covering and tucking are all points to be considered in buying.

The standard mattress is filled with horse hair. You judge the quality by the curliness and length of the hair used, the curliness insuring a filling that is springy and not likely to "lump." Mane hair is first quality, and tail hair second quality. The fillings of white hair are the most expensive, but for general use you will do better to select hair of good length without regard to the color.

A good hair mattress is, of course, the last word in luxurious comfort, and in durability. The only question is the one of the initial expense.

And with present methods of manufacture, the cotton-felt or wool-felt mattress gives excellent satisfaction. In fact, many persons choose a felt mattress from preference, quite aside from the fact that it is cheaper, because, just at first, when quite new, it is softer than a hair mattress, and can always be re-made after becoming lumpy or matted. The best felt mattresses come guaranteed not to lump, and one of these is certainly preferable to a cheap hair mattress filled with short, broken hair.

A cotton felt mattress is not made by stuffing a tick with cotton, as might be supposed but by building it up, layer by layer, with soft, thin batting.

A cheaper grade mattress is made with a filling of corn husk, grass, hay or excelsior, which will give fairly good service as long as it does not lump or break up into small pieces; sometimes, for greater comfort, these are made with grass or husks in the lower half, and cotton felt as a top filling.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether a mattress should be tufted. The plain seems to be more sanitary, but in medium grade mattresses tufting is almost necessary to prevent the filling from slipping and packing.

The best wearing mattresses have two or three rows of tacking in the boxing to keep the mattress in shape. Even after much usage you will find that such a mattress still makes up trim and square.

WRITERS NEED QUIET

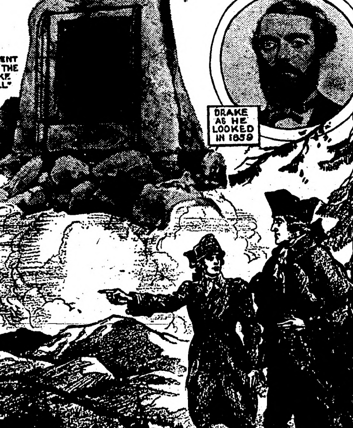
"Is it possible, my dear, that you cannot keep those children quiet for a moment," said friend husband.

"Now, John, don't be harsh with the poor little things,' said the wife, soothingly. "It's natural for them to be full of spirit, and they're doing the best they can."

"Well, if I could have a moment's peace I would sit down and write that check you've geen bothering me for."

"Children, go upstairs at once! And if I hear another word from you tonight, I'll punish you severely," said the stern mother.

Washington's Early Adventures Now Assuming New Significance



MONUMENT OVER THE "DRAKE WELL"
DRAKE AS HE LOOKED IN 1859

By HENRY BOTSFORD

AFTER well nigh a century and three-quarters a new interest has recently been aroused in the earliest military adventures of George Washington. When barely twenty-one years old, in 1753, Washington was sent by Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia into the far northwestern wilderness—that is, northwestern Pennsylvania—to warn the French that they must cease their efforts to occupy that region. Recent researches have given a new historical significance to that expedition, during which Washington, always reckless of his personal safety, had one of his narrow escapes from death at the hands of a treacherous Indian guide.

The French at that time occupied Canada and claimed the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys. Though the fringe of English speaking colonies along the Atlantic contained the chief European population, France maintained sovereignty over most of North America's area. They were apparently determined to occupy northwestern Pennsylvania, partly because it was known even then to be rich in petroleum.

Region's Wealth Known

Pioneers and missionaries, English, French, German and Dutch, had all reported to their governments that the petroleum was of great potential value. There is, however, no reason to believe that Washington knew of its existence or value until his adventure of 1753. Then he learned that the oil had long been used by the Indians and the pioneering whites for fuel and light, for medicine and in making war paint. Washington was so much impressed with its possibilities that he later became owner of a large area of oil-bearing lands. Although the petroleum industry in its modern form was then undreamed of, Washington was so sure that a fortune resided in his oil-bearing lands that in his will he listed them as his most valuable holdings. In the property schedule attached to the will he wrote:

"This tract was taken up by General Lewis and myself on account of the bituminous spring which it contains, of so inflammable a nature as to burn as freely as spirits and as nearly difficult to extinguish."

The Will of Washington

Some historians declare that in an earlier will Washington dedicated this "burning spring" to the public. At any rate, it had passed from his ownership before his death. He sold this tract for $200,000, but, suspecting it might revert to his estate under a mortgage, he warned his heirs that should it do so it would be worth much more than the $200,000.

Although Washington's first knowledge of petroleum was gained within a few miles of the place where the first oil well in the world was drilled, that first well was not opened until one hundred and six years later, 1859. In that year Edwin Laurentine Drake bored the first well, just south of Titusville, Pennsylvania, and really started the modern petroleum industry.

A Development Wonder

Today the American industry is the major part of the world's oil business. Americans are directing oil developments all over the world. It is all part of the huge problem: to make sure that the tomorrows shall see America's requirements met. Every decade the production of petroleum has doubled. Science and technical progress have met all demands. Foreign investment and development are in the nature of insurance for the future.

In the days of Drake and the industry's beginnings petroleum's value lay in lubricants and kerosene. The age of machinery was only beginning, with its insatiate demand for lubricants, while kerosene, though the best illuminant ever known, was dangerous because poor refining left gasoline that was liable to explode. It is difficult nowadays, when the world is being combed for more petroleum to make more gasoline, to realize that gasoline was once a nuisance and a menace. The internal combustion engine created the demand for gasoline, now the primary product of petroleum. The demands of millions of motor cars increasing constantly, invention and chemistry were set at work by the captains of the industry to make the barrel of petroleum turn out a larger and larger proportion of gasoline. This was done by the cracking process, through which every year now sees a larger proportion of crude oil turned into gasoline.

High and Growing Demands

Today well-nigh 2,500,000 barrels of petroleum are required every day to satisfy the demand for motor cars, tractors, trucks, buses, artificial gas plants and the innumerable by-products. Invention is constantly finding new uses, as enterprise just as constantly finds new supplies of petroleum. The wonderful and rather mysterious fluid has revolutionized social habits and industrial methods; yet it is only two-thirds of a century since the industry had its feeble beginning in the Pennsylvania oil country.

This year the country will use about 750,000,000 barrels of petroleum. The country will use 700,000,000 gallons of gasoline and will export 1,900,000 more. The production, processing and marketing of petroleum is probably second only to agriculture among American industries.

Roundly, 70 per cent of the world's petroleum industry is American. Ten billions of capital is invested in it—half the valuation of the national railroad system. It employs just about 1,000,000 people. The petroleum pipe line system, gridironing a good share of the country, aggregates about 85,000 miles. Petroleum revolutionized naval warfare by bringing in the oil burning ship; it is fast revolutionizing merchant marines in the same fashion. Multiplication of motor cars, along with the special taxation of their gasoline, has made possible the modern highway system.

A True Social Service

Perhaps the most nearly revolutionary result of Drake's modernization of the petroleum industry is to be found in the change it has brought in the life of rural America. It has carried the city to the country, the country to the city. It has, by making possible the cheap and quick transportation that everybody nowadays enjoys, enabled country and city to know and understand each other as they never did before. It has brought social and educational privileges to country dwellers that a few decades ago seemed absolutely denied to them. On the one hand it has enabled the cities to spread out into suburban areas and the zone of country estates; on the other, it has enabled the people of the open country to have neighbors, society, church and school privileges, intimate acquaintance.

It is a historic fact that the tendency toward division of interest and understanding between city and country is the most serious internal menace to the security of nations, to the integrity of society.

More than anything else, country and city need to know and understand each other and each other's problems. The easy transportation, the ready opportunity for association and acquaintance that have come with the Age of Petroleum have made possible, in this favored country at least, exactly this new intimacy and understanding.

HOW TO SAVE MONEY WHEN SHOPPING

By MRS. HARLAND H. ALLEN

(©, 1922, Harland H. Allen.)

WILL IT WEAR WELL?

"Will it wear well?" is the question uppermost in every woman's mind when she goes to buy a garment or material for making up into a dress. There are many factors that affect the wearing quality of cloth and here are a few suggestions that will help you to answer your question for yourself.

The way cloth is woven affects its endurance. Pushing the nail against the cloth to see if the weave is strong will often show unexpected looseness and weakness. By holding the material to the light and pulling it slightly apart, weakness can generally be detected. If the yarn is poor, and the weaving irregular or sleazy, or long threads have been left straggling on the surface, the fabric will not stand much strain.

Sometimes figures are woven in such a way that they shorten the wearing life of the cloth. For example, in weaving madras curtains, the filling thread, which makes the figure, jumps from one figure to another; after the material leaves the loom, the loose threads are clipped off the back, leaving short pieces of thread which often wash out or the ends become rough and fuzzy. Goods that have a heavy lengthwise cord, and very fine filling, as some dimities and ginghams, are apt to split along the heavy thread, owing to the great difference in the strength of the threads.

A close twill makes a firm, durable material, while the loose basket weave is quite apt to be lacking in firmness. Fancy weaves in cotton novelties, shirtwaist materials, and fancy mulls often leave loose threads which become soiled easily, and may not be attractive after washing.

The finishing and dressing used to give a cloth an attractive appearance are also factors in its wearing life. Some diagonal suitings have a soft finish that partly obliterates the weave; this is apt to wear off unless the pile is very thick and strong. Napped goods, if soft and thin, are liable to wear off. The satin or sateen makes a very beautiful surface, especially when applied to linens or silks, but it may cover up defects in hidden threads.

The best grades of material are generally what they seem to be, but if is when buying cheap material and novelties, where the effect is expected to be more important than the weave, that we must be especially vigilant.

Unreasonable to Expect Her.

Her Mother—Now that you know Ferdinand wasn't out with another woman, as you thought, why don't you make up with him?

Mrs. Junebride—Why, he hasn't ever attempted to beg my forgiveness.

WHAT PRICE HEALTH

VALUE of health may not be reckoned in dollars and cents. Two thousand years ago there was perhaps some excuse for the gastronome, but today there is none. The way to health lies in a balanced diet. Hippocrates, the father of medicine, figured along the same lines back 450 B. C. He expressed the belief that the science of medicine had its beginning in the efforts of men and women to find better and smoother diets.

Diet in the home today is becoming a matter of premier consideration. Women are taking cognizance of those important food elements known as vitamines. They have learned, also, the benefit to the human body of such minerals as iron, calcium and phosphorus.

This knowledge has resulted in the housewife planning her menus with an eye open to dietary values, which is the big reason why milk has assumed such a large place in the menu of the American family. Milk contains every structural element for body building. It is an almost perfect food. Despite the best refrigeration facilities, milk will keep sweet only a short time. Millions of American housewives have solved this big problem by using evaporated milk, which is simply fresh cow's milk sterilized in cans to achieve keeping qualities and with sixty per cent of the water removed.

Evaporated milk is not the same as condensed milk, although many persons confuse the two. The condensed product is a combination of milk and sugar cane in a two-fifth cane sugar and three-fifth milk proportion. Evaporated milk has nothing but water taken from it and nothing at all added. Sugar is the preservative used in manufacturing the condensed product, while heat only is the preservative for evaporated milk. For this reason the evaporated product may be used in any way in which market milk is used.

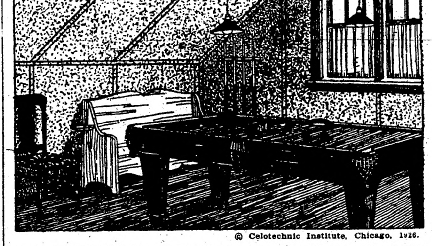
"Man," said the woman sternly, "will wake up one morning and find that the world is being ruled by women."

"Um!" sneered her husband. "Just like a woman, that."

"What's just like a woman?' she demanded.

"Why," he answered, deliberately, "to take advantage of a man when he sleeps."—Kansas City Star.

Attic for Billiards New House Feature



© Celotechnic Institute, Chicago, 1926.

A BILLIARD ROOM in the private home ranks with most people along with a country estate and its artificial lake, a gallery for musicians and other luxuries of the rich. There is no reason, though, why this clean, wholesome game should not be played right at home by every member of the family, without their scattering outside in search of fun and recreation. Very few small homes can afford an extra room just for the billiard table, but practically all have attics sitting on top of them, idle year after year. A little planning, a little work and a little money will turn almost any attic into a first-class home billiard room.

The space required is not great. A small home billiard table is about three by six feet, so that the space necessary for playing may be as small as twelve by fifteen feet. The first consideration is to make the attic comfortable as to temperature all the year round, and the second is to give a good appearance so that you will be proud to take guests up to the new billiard room. These two matters can be attended to in one operation by sealing the under side of the rafters and the side walls with celotex insulating lumber that will offer remarkable resistance to the passage of heat and cold, at the same time doing away with the necessity for lath and plaster. In a room of this sort, the lumber may well be left untreated, simply covering the joints with molding or strips of the same lumber, beveled.

In sealing the attic, especial care should be taken where the rafters meet the side walls of the house, as this is the point where most of the hot air escapes from the inside or comes in from the outside, depending on the time of year. In extreme climates or where one is to be almost totally dependent on the heat from the rest of the house for warming the attic, a double layer of the insulating lumber would be better. A small electric, gas or oil heater, will provide what little heat is needed in addition to the heat rising from below.

The floor should be as level as possible although most tables have adjustable devices on the legs. The floor should be covered with a plain piece of carpeting or even left bare.

If the house is wired for electricity, extension cords may be run up to the attic and dropped down, one over each end of the table. The length of the cords must be carefully adjusted. Opaque green shades are inexpensive and satisfactory. The racks for the cues and other apparatus may be nailed to the walls. Put serviceable curtains at the windows, add a couple of chairs that can be spared from downstairs and a smoking stand for the men, and you have a billiard room which will keep the boys at home and be a source of pleasure the year round.

A car
for every purse and purpose

THIS YEAR the General Motors line is an imposing Automobile Show in itself. Here is every style of body. Every type of design — four cylinder, six cylinder, eight cylinder. Every improvement. Every price, from the Chevrolet touring car at $510 to the Cadillac with special coach work at $9,000. A car for every purse and purpose.

Every one of the models now on display is different and distinguished. Yet two unifying characteristics bind them all together:

1 EVERY CLOSED BODY is by Fisher. The quality of all body workmanship is Fisher quality, and because Fisher is owned by General Motors, every resource has been utilized to make body and chassis a perfect quality unit.

2 EVERY MODEL has shared in the advantages of General Motors research, purchasing standards and Proving Ground tests; and in the economies of volume production. Dollar for dollar you will buy more value in the car you select because of General Motors quality and the public's purchase of more than 1,200,000 General Motors cars last year.

THE GENERAL MOTORS line is a direct result of the record-breaking patronage accorded by the public in 1926. The economies which this great volume afforded have been passed on to the car purchaser in even better quality. With great pride we invite you to inspect these new General Motors cars and to make one or more of them your own.

Meanwhile Madonna Fulvia had been conducted to the Communal. A guard was placed outside the door, and another was set to pace beneath her window; but at least she was given the freedom of that spacious chamber, and of course Mario was admitted to her presence, since he was to be her messenger to Matteo Orsini. The duke had judged it well that it should be so, since to the testimony of such letters as she might write Mario would add the confirmation of his own evidence of a fact which might be disbelieved if related by another.

Alone with his mistress, this frail child whom he had known from her cradle, the old servant now broke down utterly. His grimness deserted him utterly, and the tears rolled down his ghastly furrowed face.

"Madonna mine! Madonna mine!" he sobbed brokenly, and held out his old arms as if he would have taken her to them, paternally to comfort her. "I warned you. I told you here was no work for such gentleness as yours. I implored you to let me do this thing in your stead. What do I matter? I am old; my life has reached its evening; my loss of a few days more would be nobody's gain. But you—Oh God of Pity!"

"Calm, Mario! Be calm," she bade him gently.

"Calm?" he cried. "Can I be calm when before you lies the choice between betrayal and death, and, Gesu! such a death. Had I carried an arbalest I should have put a bolt through his devil's heart when he pronounced your doom; the fiend, the monster!"

"A beautiful devil he is," she said. Then she dropped her voice. "Mario!" She called him softly. Her eyes flashed to the door, then she drew still farther from it, over to the window overlooking the square, beckoning him to follow. He went silently, staring, impressed by the mystery of her bearing.

By the window, in lowered, murmuring accents she addressed him.

"There may yet be a way out of this," she said. "You shall bear no letters, because you will need none. Listen now." And she gave him her commands.

By the time she had done he was staring at her, his jaw fallen. Then he stirred himself out of his amazement. He broke into protests that she was but making her ruin doubly certain; he sought to dissuade her, reminded her that it was through a disregard of his counsels that she came into her present ghastly pass, and besought her not again to disregard them.

But in her headstrong way she remained unmoved, her resolve a rock upon which the torrent of his loving eloquence broke and was dissipated. And so in the end she had her way with him against his better judgment, even as last night.

"And to my lord? What shall I say to my lord?" he asked.

"As little as you can, and nothing to alarm him."

"I am to lie, then."

"Even that if need be, out of charity to him."

He departed at last, and throughout the long afternoon she sat alone in that room of the mezzanine, save for one interruption when a couple of slender vermilion striplings of the duke's household brought her food and wine in golden vessels upon salvers of beaten gold.

She sat on by the window, and toward evening she saw the duke returning with his gay cavalcade. Later, as the twilight was deepening, the two vermilion pages returned to bid her in the duke's name to the supper that was spread below. She excused herself. But the pages were gently insistent.

Perceiving not only the uselessness of further denial, but, further, that her very presence below might advance the thing she had set herself to do, she rose and signed to the pages to lead the way. In the corridor another pair awaited her, each bearing a lighted taper, who went on ahead. In this ceremonious fashion was she conducted below to the great hall, where a courtly crowd of cavaliers and ladies were assembled, making her instantly conscious—very woman that she was—of her own plain and dusty raiment, so out of place amid all this glittering splendor.

The duke himself, tall and graceful in a suit of sulphur-colored silk with silver bands at throat and waist, advanced to the foot of the stairs to receive her, bowing to her with the deference he might have used to a princess. By the hand, which she did not dream of denying him, he led her through the throng to the double doors that were thrown open upon an inner room. Here long tables were set for supper upon a dais that formed the three sides of a parallelogram.

From a fretted gallery above the doorway came a sound of lutes, archlutes, and viols, and under cover of the music—his voice so melodious that it almost seemed to sing to it—the duke addressed her.

"I rejoice for you, Madonna," he said, "that here is spread no nuptial feast."

She looked at him, and shivered slightly as she turned away again.

"It would break my heart," he pursued on that murmuring, caressing note of his that lent his voice a wooing quality, "it would break my heart to see so much beauty delivered into the arms of foul infection. Hence do I fervently pray that Matteo Orsini comes tonight."

"He will come," she answered him. "Have no doubt of that."

"He owes no less to his manhood," he said quietly. Then turned his attention to more immediate matter. "You do not eat," he reproved her.

He Broke Into Protests.

"I should choke, I think," she answered frankly.

"A cup of wine at least," he urged, and signed to a cellarer who bore a gold vessel of soft Puglia wine. But, seeing her gesture of refusal, he put forth a hand to stay the servant's pouring. "Wait," he said, and beckoned a page to him. "A moss-agate cup for Madonna Fulvia, here," he bade the stripling, and the page vanished upon his errand.

Madonna's lip curled a little. "There is no need for the precaution," she said—for moss-agate cups were said to burst if poison touched them—"I neither suspect venom nor do I fear it."

"So much I might have known," he answered, "since you have displayed yourself so subtly learned in the uses of it."

He spoke quietly and gravely, but at the words she felt herself go hot and cold at once. A scarlet wave suffused her face, then ebbed, to leave it deathly pale. His words made her perhaps realize that she had no just cause for grievance; she was a poisoner caught flagrante, and the steely treatment he meted out to her in his silken fashion was no more than her desert.

Back came the page with the gleaming moss-agate cup, which he set down before her. The waiting cellarer brimmed it at a sign from him, and his glance now inviting her she drank to steady her sudden weakness.

But the meats they placed before her continued unheeded, nor did she thereafter heed the duke when he leaned aside to mock her still with that dread gentleness of his. Her staring eyes were set expectantly upon the doors at the room's end. It waxed late, and her impatience mounted. Why did they not come, and thus put an end to the unbearable strain of suspense that racked her very soul?

Came pages now with silver basins, ewers, and napkins. Gallants and ladies dipped their hands and washed their fingers against the serving of the sweetmeats, and then without warning—but obeying, no doubt, the orders that the duke had left—those portals upon which Madonna's eyes had so long been fastened swung open, and between two men-at-arms in steel she beheld her clay-faced equerry, the faithful Mario, haggard and dust-stained, returned at last.

Do You Feed Your Hogs Cream?

OF course you wouldn't do so knowingly—with butter-fat worth 40c. to 50c. a pound. Yet hundreds of thousands of people are feeding large amounts of cream in skim-milk to their hogs—because of inefficient separators.

Without a cent of expense you can tell whether your cream separator is skimming clean. Let us bring out a new De Laval and run your skim-milk through it. You may be surprised at the amount of cream recovered.

For 48 years, since Dr. De Laval invented the centrifugal separator, De Laval Separators have led the world in efficiency of work and popularity. The present De Laval is the best of all — it has the wonderful "floating" bowl — the greatest cream separator improvement in 25 years. It is guaranteed to skim cleaner. It also runs easier with milk going through the bowl and lasts longer.

Liberal trade allowances made on old separators.

BANKERS SURVEY STATE BANK LAWS

Find That Movement for State Guaranty of Bank Has Gone Into Eclipse.

New York.—A survey of state banking laws conducted by the State Bank Division of the American Bankers Association shows marked progress toward greater uniformity and more efficient bank supervision, it is declared by Frank W. Simmonds, in charge of the division, in a statement giving the results of the investigation. He says that the movement for state guaranty of bank deposits appears to have gone into eclipse.

"The division has urged that the office of bank commissioner be freed from politics and all other functions of state government and tenure be made more secure with sufficient compensation and discretion to attract men of outstanding ability," Mr. Simmonds says. "Gratifying progress has been made during the past year in important bank legislation in many states. Idaho, Wyoming and Oregon led the list by adopting entirely new modern banking codes, while Texas and Montana have new codes in preparation.

Uniformity Among State Laws

"The survey shows that it is generally agreed there should be a high degree of uniformity among the states in laws dealing with certain fundamental principles of bank organization, regulation and supervision, and that there is a strong tendency in this direction. We find a very definite trend toward increasing the minimum capital requirements of banks to $25,000; creation of banking boards to act in an advisory capacity with the state bank commissioner, and legislation empowering bank commissioners to take complete charge of insolvent banks and to liquidate them as distinguished from liquidation through the courts.

"We find also a trend toward legislation providing for closer supervision and regulation of building and loan associations; more equitable taxation of bank stock; legislation providing for merger, conversion or consolidation of banking institutions; the legalizing and regulating of what is known as 'departmental banking'; broadening the field for investment of funds of saving banks and trust companies, and increasing the power of the bank commissioner as to granting or denying charters for new banks, and authorizing his making reasonable rules and regulations governing bank management and prescribing penalties for the violation thereof.

"Additional general characteristics of state bank legislation are for increasing the compensation of the bank commissioner and lengthening his term of office of four, five or six years, with power to appoint necessary deputies and examiners; legislation providing for the reduction of mandatory bank calls to three and reducing the number of examinations required by law annually to one; making issuance of worthless checks a misdemeanor; limiting or prohibiting an officer or director of a bank borrowing from his bank unless his collateral is approved by a majority of the board of directors, and limiting or prohibiting the opening of branch banks.

Eclipse of Guaranty Movement

"The question of state guaranty of bank deposits appears this year to have passed into an eclipse, so far as the extension of the idea is concerned, notwithstanding the fact that state guaranty laws were recommended by the governors of two states, and bills were introduced in several of the states, all of which were defeated. The general tendency, so far as state guaranty of deposits laws are concerned, is distinctly the other way, the indications being that several states now having guaranty laws are trying to free themselves from this legislation. Oklahoma has abandoned the plan of state guaranty of deposits, and this year the South Dakota legislature has repealed the state guaranty law and has referred the repeal to the people at the next general election for ratification."

SCHOOL NOTES

The fifth graders have begun a special study of Minnesota in connection with their study of the northern section of the United States. They have found many interesting facts about the forests and the formation of soils.

The fifth and sixth graders are interested at present in ordering all sizes of pictures from the Perry Picture Company. The prices vary from 1c to $2.00.

The Primary grades are studying Holland. They have a Holland village on their sandtable, with the characteristic windmill, dykes, milkcart, tulips, and hedges.

The first and second grades have begun weaving, and several paper mats have been made. It is pleasant work and strengthens co-ordination of the brain and the hands. Weaving lays a foundation in design and harmonious color combinations. There is also a number of elements in weaving for in every pattern the children must count. The first graders have begun rag rugs and the second graders, napkin rings.

The school board lately sent a resolution to our senator and representative to encourage them to maintain the provision for state aid to schools as it now stands, and not permit a cut of this aid, as is being discussed by the legislative body in St. Paul. Many other districts have also sent their opinion, and suggestions to their representatives and senators. This measure is a very important one to taxpayers, especially to those who live in districts with a comparatively low assessed valuation.

The hum of conversation sank down and was stilled as the sturdy fellow advanced up the long room between the tables and came, still flanked by his guards, to stand immediately before the duke. Not to the duke, however, but to Madonna Fulvia did he address himself when at length he spoke.

"Madonna, I have done your bidding. I have brought Ser Matteo."

A silence followed and a pause, ended at last by Cesare's short laugh.

"Body of God! Did he need bringing?"

"He did, my lord."

The duke's glance swept over the noble company. "You hear," he called to them, raising his voice. "You perceive the lofty spirit of these Orsini. An Orsini must needs be brought to ransom his mistress and kinswoman from the fate decreed her." He turned to the equerry. "Fetch him hither," he said shortly, with a wave of his fine hand.

But Mario was slow to obey. Not upon the duke but upon Madonna were his eyes set, as if awaiting her confirmation of that command. She nodded, whereupon he turned and strode down the room again upon his errand and so out.

Cesare leaned back in his high gilded chair, his slender fingers toying delicately with the strands of his auburn beard, his narrowed eyes glancing aslant at Madonna Fulvia. He found her manner very odd. It contained some quality that intrigued him, and eluded his miraculous penetration.

She sat there with ashen face and wide, staring eyes; so might a corpse have sat, and a corpse you might have deemed her but for the convulsive heave of her slight bosom.

And then a sound of voices beyond the door—of voices raised in sudden altercation—broke upon the general expectancy.

"You cannot enter!" came a gruff shout. "You cannot take—"

And then they heard Mario's voice, harsh, vibrant, and compelling interrupting and overbearing the objector.

"Did you not hear the duke's express commands that I should bear Matteo Orsini to him? I have Matteo Orsini here, and I but obey his potency's commands. Out of my way, then."

But other voices broke in upon him, all speaking together so that they made no more than a confused and bawling chorus whose purport was not to be discerned.

Suddenly Cesare rose in his place, his eyes flaming. "What's this?" he cried. "By the Host! Am I kept waiting? Set me wide those doors!"

There was a scurry of lackeys to obey that imperious voice. The duke sank back into his chair as the doors were violently pulled open. Beyond it a line of a half-dozen men-at-arms made a screen that concealed whatever lay behind them.

"My lord—" began one of these, a grizzled ancient, raising his hand in appeal.

But Cesare let him get no further. His clenched hand descended violently upon the table. "Stand back, I say, and let him enter."

Instantly that line of steel-clad men melted and vanished, and where it had been stood Mario now. He paused a moment on the threshold, his face set and grim. Then he stalked forward up the long room again between the tables. But no one heeded him. Every eye was fixed in amazed and uncomprehending horror upon that which followed after him.

Came four brothers of the Misericordia in black, funereal habits, their heads cowled, their eyes gleaming faintly from the eye holes cut in their shapeless vizors. Among them they carried a bier, whose trappings of black velvet edged with silver swept the ground as they solemnly advanced.

They were midway up that room before the company broke from the spell of horror which this grim spectacle had laid upon it. A loud outcry seemed to burst from every throat at once. Then the duke leapt to his feet, and the whole company with him, and in the sudden stir and confusion none observed that Madonna Fulvia left her place at the duke's side.

"What's this?" his potency demanded, anger ringing in his voice. "What jest is this you dare to put upon me?" And as he spoke he swung aside to where Madonna Fulvia had been; then, finding her place now vacant, his flaming eyes swept around in quest of her, and discovered her at last standing there beside the bier.

"No jest, magnificent," she answered him, her head thrown back, a smile of bitter, tragic triumph on her white face. "Faithful and utter compliance with your behest—no more. You commanded that Matteo Orsini should be delivered into your hands. Provided I did that you would release me of my compact to wed your jackal Pantaleone degli Uberti. I hold you to your word, my lord. I have done my part. Matteo Orsini is here." And she flung an arm out and downwards to indicate the bier.

"Here?" he questioned, and added the further question—"Dead?"

"Bid your guards hack off the lid that you may assure yourself 'tis he. I promise you he will offer no resistance now."

Considering him, she took satisfaction in the perception that at last she had wiped that hateful, gently mocking smile from his face. He was scowling upon her, his eyes ablaze with such a passion as no man in all Italy would willingly have confronted.

The rest of them, the whole of that splendid company, was ranged against the walls as far as possible from that hideous thing below. In their minds, as in Cesare's, there stirred a memory of what had befallen earlier that day—of that letter that had been infected and of the manner of that infection—and a suspicion of what was yet to follow began to form in the thoughts of all.

Thus for a spell of awful silence, then Cesare's voice rasped out a question harshly—a question that voiced in part that general and terrible suspicion:

"How died he?"

Came like a thunderbolt her answer, shrilly delivered on a high note of fierce exaltation—"He died of the smallpox yesternight. Hack off the lid," she added. "Hack off the lid, and take him."

But that last mocking invitation which she hurled at the duke was lost in the sudden uproar in the noise of the wild stampede that followed her announcement. Mad with fear, men who had shown themselves fearless upon a field of stricken battle turned this way and that, seeking a way out. Cursing, they hurled themselves against the long windows that opened upon the little claustral garden of the Communal, and screaming, fainting women crowded after them to avail themselves of this shortest way out that was being forced open.

It would have needed more even than the presence of that terrible duke to have restrained them in their wild panic, in their mad frenzy to breathe the clean cold air, to quit this tainted atmosphere, to fly this hideous plague-spot. Nor did Cesare make any effort to delay their flight.

With shivering of glass and crashing of splintered timbers those long window-doors were swept away. Out of the room headlong, as a river that has burst its dam, surged that courtly, terror-stricken mob; into it rushed the pure, keen air of the January night.

Cesare alone, at his place beyond the board, in the flickering light of wind-blown, guttering candles, remained even after the last lackey had fled, conquered by his panic. Indomitable, the duke stood there to face the woman who dared to bring a plague-ridden corpse to set at naught his authority and make a mock of his power.

"Well?" she asked him, and her laugh made him shudder, man of iron though he was. "Have you the courage to face Matteo Orsini now? Or do you lack it still, for all that he is dead?"

"Living I never feared him," he blazed out, unworthily it must be confessed.

Plan Ship Road Across Mexico

Would Compete With Panama Canal, Because Toll Charges Will Be Less.

New York.—A "ship railway" across the entire span of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, in the southernmost part of Mexico, with sufficient capacity for hauling the largest of the world's present day seagoing vessels, is the dream of European capitalists, according to plans revealed here.

The program calling for the construction of this novel feat of engineering, which for the last three years has occupied the attention of some of Europe's brainiest civil and mechanical engineering minds, hinges solely on the final granting of a concession under consideration by the Mexican government.

According to Rudolf Wassermann and Henrich Fastisch, German scientific engineers, at one time associated with the late Hugo Stinnes, who now are in New York on the way to the City of Mexico, the contemplated "ship railway," when completed, will prove a keen competitor to the Panama canal because its total charges will be less.

To Cost More Than $150,000,000.

"It is the contention of the scientific world," Herr Wassermann said, "that wherever a canal can be built to float a ship, a railroad can be constructed to carry one, and the present estimated cost to build the 'ship canal' across the isthmus will be between $150,000,000 and $175,000,000."

The plans which will be submitted to the Mexican government for its approval call for an almost straightaway and level route lying between the town of Coatzaccalcos, at the mouth of the river by the same name, on the Bay of Campeachy, state of Vera Cruz, across the isthmus a distance of about 117 miles, to the town of Huaxontlan, state of Oaxaca, on the Pacific coast.

Herr Wassermann said the route of the proposed "ship railway" calls for but one base across the entire stretch, and this is at a point known as Chivela, in Oaxaca, where a mammoth turntable will be built to make the necessary bend in the direction of Huaxontlan in order to take advantage of a broad and level canyon through the Sierra Madres.

Herr Wassermann said the right of way will be built up on 30 rails, spaced according to standard gauge, while the specifications call for a grade of not more than fifty feet to the mile at each terminal. The trackage will submerge or descend into water at these points, enabling the ship to be lodged into a floating drydock or cradle for transportation across the isthmus.

"The wheeled cradle carriage or drydock," explained Herr Wassermann, "will be built in sections or units, thus permitting easy adjustment of the keel blocks which readily can be arranged to accommodate the largest ships.

The cradles can be drawn by from six to fifteen heavy locomotives (depending upon the ship's tonnage). each one of which will be equivalent in hauling power to six of the ordinary freight type.

Out of Water Seven Hours.

"Every known feature and angle has been given most careful study, even to the pressure of one-hundredth of an inch upon the cradle and roadbed when ships of various capacities are on the way from terminal to terminal," Herr Wassermann said.

Herr Fastisch, who is a former artillery colonel of the imperial German army, says one of the ship loaded cradles can be transported across the isthmus at the rate of 20 miles an hour, and that no vessel will be kept out of the water more than seven hours at the most, it being figured that it will take almost an hour to make the necessary bend on the turntable at Chivola. "The bar at the mouth of the river at Coatzaccalcos, on the Gulf of Mexico, will have to be dredged extensively to permit the vessels to get into the runway approaching the site of the eastern terminal," continued Herr Fastisch, "as also will be the case of Hauxontlan, where an artificial harbor will have to be dredged to carry the scheme to a successful conclusion. The latter feat alone will require an expenditure of from $5,000,000 to $7,500,000.

Gold in Walls Where Sons Killed Father

Kansas City, Mo.—The murder of a father by his two sons nearly half a century ago was vividly recalled in the community of Rosendale, Mo., recently when workmen tore down the old farm residence of Dr. P. H. Talbot and found a number of $20 gold pieces inside the walls of the room in which the doctor lost his life. More than $100 was found the first day and it is thought that there is more money hidden in the walls. Doctor Talbot was shot by his sons the night of September 18, 1880, and died a short time later. The sons were hanged July 22, 1882, after three trials.

Waves for Men Latest Fad in West London

London.—Permanent waves for men is becoming a flourishing business with fashionable hairdressers in the west end. It threatens to become quite a fashion here. The male wave costs $25 and can be done in a comparatively short time. It has become popular especially with actors. But permanent-waved men can only wear their hair in one way, brushed straight back, and without a parting.

Cat Warns Mistress of Robbers in Home

Oconto, Wis.—That a cat may guard a home from thieves as well as from mice, was proven here recently when "Pat," a 20-pound feline, frustrated the attempts of two robbers in the home of his mistress, Mrs. Helen McClelland.

The cat, startled by the entrance of the men, rushed to the bedroom where Mrs. McClelland slept and awakened her by jumping on the bed. She investigated the cause of the feline's agitation and heard the intruders making their escape.

FLAGELLANTES STILL SURVIVE IN NORTHERN PARTS OF NEW MEXICO

Members of Fanatical Creed Torture Themselves as Part of Religious Ceremony.

Santa Fe, N. M.—Penitentes remain in the United States to this very day. Within the last month their activities have been repeatedly observed in northern New Mexico in the counties of Taos, Colfax, Rio Arriba, Mora, San Miguel, Sandoval, and Valencia.

This cult of flesh torturers, popularly supposed to have become extinct better than a century ago, believes heavenly bliss can be obtained by torturing the body. They are supposed to be a long removed survival of the Flagellantes, a sect organized in Italy in 1210 A. D.

In the Sixteenth century the fanatical creed broke out again, and Pope Clement VI issued a papal bull against them March 25, 1574. From Spain and Portugal the sect was brought to Mexico and it has survived principally among the Indians and half breeds in these thinly settled counties of New Mexico.

There are three orders of penitentes. The first order are allowed to be present only at the sect churches, which are hidden well among the canyons and mountains. Those belonging to the second degree are allowed to hold office, and those of the third degree are obligated to practice self-punishment.

There are two principal methods of self-torture practiced today. The first is to cut a deep cross between the shoulders in which is placed a wooden bit and to the bit is tied a heavy wooden cross which the self-appointed victim drags about over the desert. By the other method they braid ropes of yucca, a long sprayed cactus, and strip themselves and flog one another to the rhythm of ritual chants. Women as well as men are allowed membership in the sect and participate equally in the self-torture.

Drink Water to Help Wash Out Kidney Poison

If Your Back Hurts or Bladder Bothers You, Begin Taking Salts

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulates them to their normal activity. The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

NEW WING PLANNED FOR U. S. CAPITOL

Building, Begun in 1783, to Have Extension.

Washington.—The capitol, as it stands today, is a symbol of the nation's growth. It has passed through three major stages of expansion, and is yet to be completed through extension of the central part of the east front to give it better architectural balance with the present senate and house sections.

This vast white monument, covering 153,113 square feet, embraces the first capitol of the United States, a modest, almost plain structure about 120 feet long and 100 feet wide, once large enough to accommodate the senate, the house, the Supreme court and the Library of Congress, but now too small for the court and its library.

Funds were scarce when the young government set out in 1793 to build its capitol after a design by Dr. William Thornton, calling for a domed rotunda, a portico and two wings, so it was decided to erect first only the north wing. That was completed in 1800 and congress, the court and the library moved in. "The Oven," a temporary round brick structure, was put up the next year on the site of the house wing, the permanent structure of which was not finished until 1811, three years before both wings were burned by the British. After repairs had been made, work was begun on the rotunda, and the capitol visioned by Thornton was completed in 1827.

It then proved adequate until shortly before the Civil war, when it became necessary to build the present senate and house extensions. Subsequently the library was given a building of its own, and large office buildings were erected for senators and representatives. The library and the house office building are already overcrowded.

When the senate moved into its extension in 1859, the Supreme court acquired the old senate chamber, and only recently have its members been willing to contemplate leaving that room where Webster, Clay, Calhoun, many of the great of the early republic, made history with words. A new site has been selected for a Supreme court building east of the capitol, near the Library of Congress.

Depicts Future Man as Bodily Ugly, Brainy

Philadelphia.—"A bald-headed, toothless, chinless, thin-shouldered, spindle-legged individual," was the futuristic portrait of the average person of the next generation painted for the Philadelphia Physical Education association by James E. Rogers, director of the National Physical Education Service of New York city.

But the man of the future, though he may have lost all claim to beauty, will be well equipped with brains, Mr. Rogers added.

The one way to avoid having his futuristic sketch become a reality, the speaker added, was for the present generation to return to its "natural heritage of climbing, swimming and running." He indicated that a school day lengthened to conform with the present business day, to provide a more complete recreation program and foster "educational athletics as against spectator athletics," would be a welcome step in American educational methods.

45 Days on Trail to Get to Seat in Legislature

Nome, Alaska.—State legislators who complain of over-night travel to reach the capital, have only one forty-fifth the troubles of Thomas Gaffney, representative-elect to the Alaska legislature. Gaffney is now mushing outbound from here with dogs. When he reaches Nenana behind his team he will take the government railroad to Seward. From there it is a steamer ride to Juneau. The legislature convenes at Juneau the first Tuesday in March and Gaffney calculates with 45 days start to just about make it.

London Street Is Paved With Blocks of Rubber

Washington.—The first thoroughfare to be constructed of rubber is now in use in London. Blocks consisting of rubber caps, vulcanized to a brick base, have been laid in New Bridge street, a road subjected to heavy traffic, and, according to cable reports to the Department of Commerce, have proved successful.

Famous Irish Castle Will Be Abandoned

Belfast.—A recent decision of the war office to abolish Carrickfergus castle as a military station makes very uncertain the future of one of the most historic spots in the British Isles.

The castle is situated on the shore of Belfast lough and was founded in 1128 by Sir John de Courcy, one of the Norman invaders, and was for centuries the scene of much strife between Ireland and England.

King William the Third landed there in 1690 on his way to the Boyne and some years later the French privateer Thurot was captured there.

U. S. LONGEST TUNNEL NEARING COMPLETION

Greatest Engineering Feat of Modern Times.

Tolland, Colo.—When drillers boring from each side of the Continental divide near Tolland meet in the center of James peak within the next few weeks, consummation of one of the greatest engineering feats of modern times will have taken place.

A force of 700 men is laboring daily to rush completion of the gigantic project known as Moffatt tunnel this spring. When finished it will extend slightly more than six miles, making it the longest tunnel in the United States. Passing directly under one of the highest peaks of the Continental divide, it will open up the long isolated Moffatt country, a virgin territory larger than the state of New York, and will save approximately twelve hours' running time between Denver and Salt Lake City, on opposite side of the Rocky mountain range.

To Be Ready July 1.

Unless more unforeseen difficulties arise, the tunnel will be ready for the first train to pass through it on July 1.

At present trains crossing the divide are forced to climb a winding mountain trail more than 30 miles long before they arrive at Corona, on top of the range, 11,666 feet above sea level. Trains passing through Corona, a town which consists merely of a telegraph operator's hut, entirely inclosed by a snow shed, move on the highest standard-gauge tracks in the world.

For several months in the year traffic often is stopped for days at a time because of heavy snowfalls on the right of way. The chief operating expense of the line, according to its annual report, is caused by the necessity for almost constant use of snow-removal equipment.

When the Moffatt tunnel is completed all of these difficulties will be eliminated. Trains will travel on almost level ground until they come to the entrance of the tunnel. There they will start climbing a gentle grade straight through the Continental divide and more than two miles below ground. When they get to the middle of the tunnel the grade will change and they will gradually go downward and out into the open country beyond.

The tunnel, expected to cost $10,000,000 before it is completed, is being financed by the counties it will serve. The railroad using the bore, in turn, will repay the counties affected. The rental scale will be graduated to provide for the expected increased earning capacity of the road after the new route has been in use several years.

Almost insurmountable difficulties have been passed so far by engineers constructing the mammoth hole. Such obstacles as soft rock, requiring extensive and permanent timbering, and underground rivers, which had to be pumped away, have faced the contractors almost constantly.

Strike Subterranean River.

At one place, for instance, an unknown subterranean river was struck. It filled the tunnel as rapidly as the pumps would empty it. Finally it was noticed that Crater lake, high up in the mountains, was becoming lower. Engineers dropped several tons of coloring matter into the lake. When they went down to the tunnel they discovered that the water swirling through it was the same color as that in the lake above. The lake almost vanished before the contractors were able to stop its rushing flow through the tunnel.

Some idea of the stupendous size of the project may be gained from the latest construction figures. Seven hundred miles of holes have been drilled; 2,500,000 pounds of blasting powder used; 11,000,000 board feet of timber, corresponding to 2,000 miles of planks an inch thick and a foot wide, have been put in place; 800,000 pounds of drill steel have been consumed, and more than 3,000,000,000 tons of rock have been removed.

Alberta's Silver Foxes Found of High Value

Clairmont, Alb.—Silver foxes reared in the Peace river country of northern Alberta are attaining a remarkable reputation for quality, and fox farms in many sections of the United States and Canada now have stock taken from this district.

Alfred Fraser, a prominent New Yorker, once saw in New York four pelts from the ranch of F. E. Turner of Clairmont consigned to London, and was so struck with their quality that he delegated a representative to the Peace river country to secure live silver foxes. A big trade has since been built up in supplying breeding foxes. Last year Turner shipped 80 consignments to all parts of the continent.

100 Eagles Attack Flock of Sheep, Kill Forty-two

Moscow.—A great flock of mountain eagles, darkening the sky, swooped down on the meadows of the Dagestan republic and killed forty-two sheep in one mass attack, according to word received by the Soviet commissary of agriculture. The terrified shepherds, accustomed to beating off the attacks of single eagles, fled when the big birds descended on their flocks in mass formation. It was estimated that at lease 100 eagles participated in the raid from the sky.

TENANTS CHARGED BY YARD IN RUSSIA

Landlord Also Considers the Size of Salaries.

Moscow.—In Russia rooms are rented by the yard and paid for on the basis of a tenant's weekly wage. Bolshevism has evolved a rent law unparalleled anywhere else.

The commissioner of health established a minimum space necessary for a wholesome life for one person. This is called the "minimum norm." Any worker is entitled to this living space, and pays for it in proportion to his salary.

When two or more persons live together, all earning money, the rate of rent for their room is fixed by the largest salary earned by one of its inhabitants. This makes the "nepmen," or private business men, extremely unpopular as tenants, because it drives up the rent of all in their apartments to the higher level of their incomes.

But the "nepmen" are popular among co-operative house-building organizations, of which there are now 450 in Moscow. To make both ends meet on the small payment of $50 required of members of co-operatives, one-tenth of the available living space in co-operative houses usually is sold or rented to nonmembers. Naturally, "nepmen" are preferred because, compared to others, they have such a large amount of money.

Besides what they can get from the "nepmen," the housing co-operatives are assisted by state funds, which are generally loaned to them at 2 per cent interest, with repayment in forty-five years.

The "minimum norm" officially declared able to support one life in good condition is fixed at about 7 by 7 feet, which can under certain conditions be increased to about 10 by 10 feet. Many concessions and exceptions are made, such as for students, whose rent is only five cents a month for each "minimum norm" they occupy.

Tapestries, Once Pope's, May Come to New York

New York.—Tapestries which once decorated the palace of a pope, and which are valued at $300,000, soon may be hung in St. Patrick's cathedral here. The World learned recently that wealthy New York Catholics are considering purchase of one or more of the tapestries for presentation to the cathedral.

Woven in the Seventeenth century on the pre-Gobelin looms of De la Planche from designs drawn by Rubens, the set was presented by Louis XIII of France to Cardinal Barberini, who later became Pope Urban VIII. For years they hung in the Barberini palace at Rome.

The set, of which seven survive, were brought to this country by Mrs. Rosa Lewis, English hotel owner, who acquired them from Mrs. Benjamin Guiness of the English brewing family, who bought them from the descendants of the Barberini family. Mrs. Lewis brought them here to sell, and has already received offers for individual pieces, but it is hoped to keep the whole set together.

The seven tapestries, all excellently preserved, represent scenes from the life of the Emperor Constantine, first Christian ruler of the world. Nearly a century was needed to complete the entire set, one of the first famous tapestries made in France.

The sum needed to purchase the tapestries would be about $300,000. Until they are sold five of them are on exhibition at the Grand Central Art galleries.

Says Friends Know You by Noise of Your Face

London.—"It is possible to distinguish your face from other people's faces by the noise it makes," said J. L. Baird, the televisor inventor, in a lecture here the other night. He then proceeded to demonstrate.

He explained that he had discovered that transmissions of pictures by the television system were received as sounds by telephone or radiophone, each object or scene having its corresponding vibration.

In his demonstration he used pictures of various persons, and then of a matchbox, a pair of scissors, a hat and a cabbage. One face made a sound like a saw, another like a pneumatic riveter, while the hat purred softly. The cabbage's image emitted a noise like a man gargling.

These sounds, Mr. Baird said, formed permanent records from which the original images could be reproduced.

Factory Hands Better Paid Than Office Help

New York.—Factory workers and other manual laborers receive an average higher wage than office employees, according to a survey of the national industrial conference board, made public here recently. Weekly wages of the first type of employees averaged $2 a week more than those of clerical workers, the analysis revealed. The office salary study was based on earnings in twenty occupational classifications of office workers. The data for the survey was gathered in eighteen cities and was collected separately for men and women.

Winter chills bring varied ills

—the time good elimination is most important

COLDS, chills and changes in temperature impose extra strain on our kidneys. Sluggishness of function is apt to permit some retention of body-poisons in the blood and make one more susceptible to the ills of winter. Presence of this unfiltered waste makes one listless, tired and achy—causes drowsy headaches, dizziness and often a toxic backache. Disturbed function is often evidenced by scanty or burning secretions. At such times a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys is indicated. Doan's Pills have been winning friends for more than forty years. Ask your neighbor!

After 15 Years Rid of Rheumatism

Muscles and joints attacked, Bismarck, N. D., man endured 15 years of agony. Health undermined, tries Tanlac and wins back former strength

"At times I could not move about or raise my arms," said B. F. Burbage, 309 Fourth St., Bismarck, N. D. "I was practically crippled, and every movement caused excruciating pains. When these bad spells came on I had to quit business altogether, as I could not attend to it.

"Other distressing conditions developed in my system. My heart bothered me a lot and my nerves were unstrung. My appetite just died; I had no desire for food. My whole system just seemed to slump. After 15 years I was in a bad way.

"I tried about everything in that time and finally in 1923 decided to give Tanlac a trial. The first few bottles helped me so well that I kept on taking Tanlac and improved right along. At last I was completely well again, free from all pain and feeling strong and robust for the first time in 15 years. Since then my joints and muscles have been free from the slightest twinge of pain. The rheumatism is out of my system, I'm eating well and have put on 15 lbs. I recommend Tanlac with unbounded confidence."

Mr. Burbage is but one of thousands helped to rugged health by Tanlac. In our files are over a hundred thousand letters from grateful folks who credit Tanlac for their vigorous health. It is nature's own remedy made from roots, herbs and barks. Your own druggist has Tanlac. Over 52 million bottles already sold.

Never in the history of centrifugal cream separators has there been a machine equal to the De Laval. Each model has, in its day, been far ahead of all other machines in skimming efficiency, ease of operation and superior durability.

The present model De Laval is the crowning achievement of all. It has the wonderful new self-centering bowl which runs smoother and easier, eliminating vibration and thus making the separator still more durable.

You will get a richer, smoother, higher-testing cream with this new De Laval—and more of it, too. Best of all, your old cream-wasting separator will be accepted as part payment—no matter what its age, make or condition. Bring it in and we will arrange a "swap" so that your new De Laval will actually pay for itself while you are using it.

BETTER THAN FISH'MAN'S LUCK

Local Men Become Master Nimrods

Stories of fishermen's luck have often dragged their weary way to our desk, stories which would break off in the middle were they stretched any more, but this week we have two stories which need no stretching, for they come from an authoritative source. Here they are:

1. As Ralph Eckerdalen was walking along in a wood northwest of here one fine day recently, with his rifle slung over his arm, two wolves magestically stalked out of the willows, looked at him, and met a couple bullets with which Mr. Eckerdalen instantly greeted them. One of the wolves keeled over and gave up the ghost while the other left one of his legs as a memento, and limped off thru the willows with Mr. Eckerdalen in hot pursuit.

He lost the second wolf in the willows, but nevertheless Mr. Eckerdalen was satisfied with the day's hunting, as the wolf he bagged will bring him $15 bounty and perhaps as much, if not more, for the pelt.

2. The same day, we are informed on good authority, Caurin Hevle stuck his fork into a straw-pile. This is, in itself, a harmless act, and one of which every farmer is guilty of at some time in his life. But it is the results of this act which we are concerned with here; for no sooner had Mr. Hevle stuck his fork into the straw-pile than the straw began to boil and heave in an alarming manner. Mr. Hevle turned over a forkful of straw and uncovered three fine prime mink, which immediately tried to escape. Right and left Mr. Hevle slashed with his fork, and the result was three dead mink.

As the fur of this animal is in great demand, the pelts bringing up to $20 each, Mr. Hevle uncovered a small fortune with his fork.

Now, let's hear some more stories!

The Leading Lady

By Geraldine Bonner

If you had the good fortune to read Miss Bonner's thrilling story, "The Girl at Central," you know what she can do with a mystery plot. Her new story, "The Leading Lady," is even better; in fact, is her most compelling novel. It is for the delight of all mystery readers who demand action, thrills and suspense. Along with the mystery is pleasing romance and some very interesting glimpses into the real life of stage people.

SCHOOL NOTES

The first and second graders have ordered Perry Pictures, which they will study. Each child will make a booklet in Art class in which to put his pictures.

The second grade has begun a new spelling contest. Two captains have chosen sides and are working very hard, as the winning side will be excused from one spelling lesson at the end of the contest.

The primary grades are having a clean teeth crusade. Everyone has a tooth brush. Those who use their tooth brush evening and morning will receive credit on our chart.

The sixth graders are having what is called a flag week. After studying what our proper attitude toward the flag should be, they are entering these rules, together with drawings to illustrate each, in a patriotic booklet.

The seventh and eighth grades spent their physiology period in the science laboratory Tuesday. An experiment was set up for the preparation of oxygen. After the gas had been made, Mr. Palmer gave a demonstration of the value of the product to animal life.

The English I class has just completed the study of "The Merchant of Venice." About four weeks was spent in the study of this play. Their next classic for class reading will be "Ivanhoe."

Masterpiece of Mystery

Do not fail to read the amazingly clever mystery story, "The Leading Lady," which starts in next week's issue. Novelty of setting; novelty of plot; novelty of characters; novelty in the devices of detection; and above all, novelty in the conclusion:—these characterize this masterpiece of mystery. The conclusion, especially, is notable in that it is worked out in action, and not by theory or exposition. There is no falling down at the finish, but a real, satisfying surprise which is approached gradually, inevitably, and powerfully by thrill upon thrill.

By all means start reading this story in the next issue.

Have Kidneys Examined By Your Doctor

Take Salts to Wash Kidneys if Back Pains You or Bladder Bothers

Flush your kidneys by drinking a quart of water each day, also take salts occasionally, says a noted authority, who tells us that too much rich food forms acids which almost paralyze the kidneys in their efforts to expel it from the blood. They become sluggish and weaken; then you may suffer with a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, your stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine gets cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get sore and irritated, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids, to help cleanse the kidneys and flush off the body's urinous waste, get four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy here; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days, and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate sluggish kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink.

U. S. WORRIED OVER HELIUM SHORTAGE

Principal Source of Supply Playing Out.

Washington.—America faces a helium shortage. And helium is the unburnable gas that, although undiscovered on earth before 1895, is used to inflate dirigibles and thus keep them from exploding, as those filled with hydrogen are likely to do.

The natural gas from the Petrolia (Texas) field, which has provided helium up until now, is playing out. Since congress has authorized the construction of two giant dirigibles, each with a capacity of 6,000,000 cubic feet, to cost $8,000,000, lack of helium is worrying government officials. The navy and the United States bureau of mines are asking congress to appropriate money to pipe to the Fort Worth (Texas) helium extraction plant, built during the war, the helium-bearing natural gas of Nocona, only 25 miles from Petrolia.

The appropriation desired is $500,000, which is needed to construct the necessary pipeline and pressure plant. The bill is now awaiting action by the senate. Once the money is appropriated, it will be a matter of only six or seven months before the helium supply can be increased.

The Nocona field was discovered in 1922, but natural gas, although burned in the field, has never been drawn away. The life of the Nocona supply is about 15 years, and it will probably produce from 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 cubic feet of helium a year during that time.

More helium is essential with the construction of the two giant dirigibles in view. There never was enough helium to float the Los Angeles and the Shenandoah simultaneously. With the destruction of the Shenandoah, the world's largest single store of pure helium was lost. Each of the projected giant dirigibles will need three times the helium now being used by the dirigible Los Angeles.

Cattle Malady Laid to Lack of Phosphates

Sturgeon Bay, Wis.—A cattle malady that has puzzled dairymen in Door county for months has been traced to its source, according to a report from Dr. B. A. Beach of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture.

Lack of phosphates in the soil and consequently in the cattle feed caused all the trouble, he said.

A herd of six afflicted animals was placed at the peninsula branch of the state experimental station and fed a well-balanced ration after postmortem examination on cows that died of the trouble showed lack of phosphates and limes in their bones. This ration, in which the proper phosphates were included, brought the cattle back to full strength and weight in a few months.

The soil in northern Door county is very shallow, and due to this the phosphates in the soil were quickly used up. According to Prof. E. J. Delwiche, head of the experimental station, nine-tenths of the farms in this district are lacking in phosphates, and many other farms in Wisconsin are also showing the effects of insufficient phosphates in the soil.

Local Fancier Breeds Dogs That Do Not Bark

Bellingham, Wash.—By interbreeding with a type of Siberian sledge dogs, a local fancier has developed a species of dog that does not bark. They have a manner of howling something akin to the wolf, but when well fed forget even that vocal ability. In begging for food they try to attract attention by a whine and guttural cough.

White House Employs Small Clerical Force

Washington.—With the exception of the fine arts commission which has but two hired hands, the White House has the smallest clerical force of any government department or independent bureau.

Forty-four employees, including three women, are assigned to the executive offices to assist President Coolidge administrate the nation's business.

Uncle Sam employs a total of 560,705 persons to keep the wheels of government moving, compared with a total of 438,057 in 1916. When the armistice was signed in November, 1918, the largest number of clerks in history, 917,760, were on the government pay rolls.

The Post-Office department leads the field in employees with 305,985. The Treasury department is second with 51,619 and the War department third with 48,768. The Justice department has the smallest number, 3,763, of any of the executive departments.

POOR HORSE COLLARS CAUSED ROME'S FALL

French Savant Advances an Original Theory.

Paris.—Did Rome fall because no public-spirited citizen knew enough to invent a harness that would adequately utilize horse power? This weak joint in the armor of the fallen empires of antiquity was pointed out by Commandant Lefebvre des Noettes at a recent meeting of the French Institute of Anthropology.

Commandant des Noettes has made a complete survey of the history of the use of animal motive power from the early dawn of civilization. The harness of the ancients, he explained, had for its principal organ of traction a collar consisting of a leather band that went around the neck like a dog collar, without touching the shoulders, and which was attached to a wooden yoke just above the withers. This collar was so placed that it most effectively cut off the animal's wind by pressing on his windpipe and the large artery of the throat.

Almost Strangled Horses.

As soon as a team felt the weight of a chariot and its passengers exerting pressure on the collar they were forced to rear up their heads and dash off to save themselves from strangling. Hence the rampant attitude of all the horses depicted in ancient papyri and sculptures, declared Commandant des Noettes.

As a result of this drawback the great civilizations of the past were never able to get more than a fraction of the potential motive power from their horses. Oxteams operating with a wooden yoke attached to the horns, not greatly different from that in use today, did not suffer from the oppressive collar and in consequence did most of what heavy hauling was done. Both oxen and horses were unshod and in consequence were not much good in rough ground.

Couldn't Haul Half a Ton.

Data obtained from translations of the Greek historian Xenophon and from the Theodosian code about a thousand years later, said Commandant des Noettes, indicate that no team of oxen in ancient times was ever considered capable of transporting a load of over half a ton.

Various ineffectual attempts were made to modify to better advantage the accepted type of harness, but not until after the era of Charlemagne, about the time of the beginning of the Capet dynasty in France, did some inventive genius devise a horse collar that was practical.

For six hundred years the water mill for grinding corn had failed to bring great benefit to the Romans, simply because it took numberless animals to draw enough grain to supply its needs. Where grain could not be transported in ships the arduous labor of hand grinding continued to be the order of the day. The lack of adequate transportation of raw products and the consequent dependence on slave labor, according to Commandant des Noettes, constituted the great weakness of the civilizations of the past. The invention of the modern harness gave to the world, he declared, a motive force more powerful and economical than slavery.

Discover Branch Fossil 100,000,000 Years Old

Pittsburgh, Pa.—A tree branch fossil estimated to be 100,000,000 years old is a prized possession of the Carnegie Institute of Technology here.

The fossil, found in a coal mine at Harmarsburg, Pa., is described by geologists as a "lepidodendron lanceolatum," a plant which contributed greatly to the forming of coal deposits in the carboniferous era.

The woody part of the tree became carbonized with other branches that became coal and the fossil is almost as thin as paper. It is a tree top four feet high with branches spreading three feet. Bark, limbs, twigs and leaves are very clearly marked.

Miners in the Harmar mine of the Consumer Mining company found the fossil in the slate roof of an entry, and the company gave it to the institute.

Moscow.—Roast beef, cafe au lait, consomme and other adaptations of foreign names for foods henceforth will appear no more on Russian bills of fare. The government has ordered that foods in Russia must be called by their proper Russian names to stimulate national feeling in Russia and thereby unintentionally making life a little less happy for foreign visitors.

Icicles in Alaska Tunnels Delay Railroad Traffic

Anchorage, Alaska.—Huge icicles in tunnels along the route of the Alaska government railroad are interfering with through on time traffic. Last week three pillars of ice several feet thick formed of frozen drippings from ceilings of tunnels between Mile 44 and Mile 52. The ice was so brittle, however, from intense cold that a blow of an ax shattered the obstructions.

Lorna Doone a Myth

RANCHER'S LIFE SAVED BY HORSE

Animal Waits for Injured Man to Mount.

Sioux Falls, S. D.—Harris Rinderneck, a rancher of northwestern South Dakota, is the owner of a horse which he would not sell for its weight in gold. His affection for the animal is due to the fact that it saved his life.

During a storm recently, while the temperature was below zero, Rinderneck was rounding up some of his cattle, riding the horse which afterward saved his life, when the animal slipped and fell, throwing Rinderneck to the ground, breaking his leg and rendering him unconscious. Instead of the horse scrambling to its feet and dashing away, as most animals would have done, it scrambled to its feet and stood patiently beside the form of its master on the ground.

When the rancher regained consciousness he found the horse there waiting for him. Helpless, so far as attempting to walk was concerned, he grasped the saddle stirrup nearest to him, then spoke quietly to his horse and with his voice guided it to a snowbank which was of sufficient height to enable him to crawl to the back of the horse.

He then rode to the nearest farm house, but on arriving at the gate he was unable to make any one hear his calls for help. In this extremity he produced his pliers and cut the fence, riding up to the house, where he was given assistance and then taken to the nearest town for surgical attention for his broken leg.

The rancher declares that had his horse not waited for him he would have frozen to death. He was several miles from home when the accident happened, and it would have been impossible for him to have crawled that distance.

Gun Shot Both Round and Square Bullets

Los Angeles, Calif.—The deadly Marlin machine gun, capable of firing 16 bullets a minute, one of the prize exhibits in the recent trial of accused Mexican revolutionists, is a far cry from its first ancestor, invented in England away back in 1717. The modern gun may put it all over its forebear in speed and accuracy, but it hasn't inherited one classic feature which seems to have recommended the first one—that of being able to shoot square bullets against Turks and round ones against Christians.

G. E. Chase, in charge of the patent room in the Los Angeles public library, recently came across the specification for this first gun, granted to James Ruckle. It was a portable gun, or a machine called a "defense," and the description ran as follows:

"The gun is a revolver and is mounted on a tripod; it has a single barrel and a rotating chamber. The shape of the chambers and of the bullets may be changed or varied, some for shooting square bullets against Turks and others for shooting round bullets against Christians."

Lose Fortune by Failing to Pay Tax of 98 Cents

Wellington, Kan.—Seven two-acre tracts of land, whose owners lost title back in the nineties by failure to pay taxes of 98 cents per tract, now are valued at $100,000. The owners in 1893 considered the land worth about $12.50 an acre.

The discovery of oil is responsible. Benjamin Reitz, a Kansas pioneer, had a "feeling" the land would be valuable some day, and religiously kept up his tax payments, while his neighbors let theirs lag and finally lost title.

Then an oil company drilled a test well and found oil. This well now is pumping 1,200 barrels a day.

Cut Off "Twistle"

Oswaldtwistle, England.—This little town is going to lose its "twistle" and probably become plain Oswald. The councilmen have decided "twistle" is cumbersome.

Seeks Safer Job

London.—Because the streets are too dangerous, Harold Solomon has sold his taxicab and began studying aviation. He purposes to run an air taxi.

Hunt in Sheba's Land for Stolen Jewish Ark

New York.—A legend that the Ark of the Covenant, stolen by Menelik I, son of Solomon and the queen of Sheba, from Jerusalem, is in a temple in the remote fastnesses of Abyssinia is to be investigated by an expedition which left here recently.

Search will be made for trace of the secluded Jewish tribe, the Falashes, who refused to risk the Red sea passage with Moses.

The expedition, sponsored by Adventure Magazine, will hunt specimens of the black-maned lion and two rare specimens of monkey, the Gellada and the Hamadgros, for the national zoological park in Washington.

Gordon MacCreagh and Mr. and Mrs. Earl Rossman are members of the expedition. Reports of the trip will be made by radio.

When They Became Engaged

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

SOMETIMES Tom sat tensely at the little writing table for an hour or more writing to his beloved Edith. Sometimes he just sat sprawled out in an easy chair before the fire idly dreaming—of Edith, who lived eight hundred miles away and whom he saw but seldom.

This keeping bachelor apartments with a man engaged was beginning to get on Jim's nerves. For weeks, even before Tom was engaged, he had been, as Jim thought, mentally unbalanced.

Perhaps the worst feature of Tom's malady was his apparent joyousness. He whistled like a canary bird when he dressed in the morning. He always thought the weather was fine and he always felt tip top. In a way Jim envied him. But then, thought Jim, Tom no doubt deserved what happiness he felt. Falling in love—loving a girl before he knew whether she cared for him, proposing—after these dreaded preliminaries he surely deserved a period of bliss.

Kate Fenwick had worked in the same office with Jim for two or three years. Nice girl, Kate—was what he thought about her if he thought anything. He saw her and talked with her every day. She usually took his dictation. Sometimes she showed him little things she had bought—wedding presents for girls who were getting married, little toys for her nephews and nieces.

Business was extremely brisk toward spring and it was apparent one Saturday that some special reports would have to be put through on Sunday. The president of the concern asked Jim to attend to them and incidentally suggested to Kate Fenwick that she meet Jim at the office to take dictation.

They began working that spring Sunday at nine o'clock and Jim was so interested in his work that he never once thought of Kate as anything more than an automaton until it was past twelve. That was one thing that made Kate such a good stenographer. She was never obtrusive—didn't use perfume or wear dangling bracelets or bright colors.

They finished their work about the same time and for no reason in particular Jim asked Kate what she was going to do next. Kate looked up, blushing a little, and Jim felt that perhaps he had been abrupt with her. She had worked like a little steam engine and he had never thought of her as being even human. That is why he asked her to have luncheon with him. There were so few places open downtown on Sunday and she lived far uptown. After luncheon he asked her again what she was going to do, and again she blushed and said nothing. "I'm going to take a ferry across the river and then take a walk along the river bank on the other side," he told her. Kate said she envied him and so Jim asked her if she would care to go with him.

Spring in the air made the river bank very beautiful that afternoon, and as Jim and Kate climbed up and down the steep embankments Jim held Kate's round little arm to keep her from slipping. He made no effort to be agreeable or otherwise to this girl whom he saw every day but he began to realize that it was very good to have her with him.

Then they sat on an embedded boulder that looked out over the river below. Jim felt as if he were a thousand miles away from the city. He looked at the shapely hand stretched out on the rock beside him, and studied those fingers that had worked so efficiently for him that morning.

It seemed the most natural thing in the world to lift that hand up in his and as it felt very docile he lifted it to his lips to kiss it. Suddenly Jim felt awkward. He felt as if he had arrived somewhere without knowing how he had come. He began to wonder whether he could trace his steps back again. Then he wondered whether he really wanted to.

"You aren't angry with me, are you—Kate?" he asked.

"Of course not, Jim," she said, and he noticed that tears gleamed in her pretty brown eyes. "You know I have always liked you, Jim."

"And I have always thought you the best stenographer in the world," said Jim, feeling suddenly that perhaps he had better find his way back again. But Kate took her hand away from him and turned, trying in vain to hide a falling tear.

"I think much more than that," said Jim, feeling suddenly very forlorn without that little hand in his. He took it back again and kissed it.

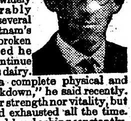
"I'm so happy, Jim—dear," said Kate, and then without knowing how it happened Jim realized that his arms were around Kate and that her smooth little head was resting on his shoulder.

When Jim got back to the apartment at six that night he found Tom sprawling in an easy chair before the fireplace in which glowed a few fading embers. Jim took off his coat and hat and dropped down in a chair on the other side of the fireplace. For an hour the two men sat there—the same rather foolish, contented expression written on both faces. Then when the last flicker of light died from the embers Tom roused himself. He suggested having something to eat.

"Something to eat—that's right—I'd forgotten," stammered Jim. "You see, old pal, I'm engaged."

Dakota Dairyman Tells Facts

For many years J. H. Putnam sought relief in vain. Completely broken in health and spirit, he tried Tanlac. Now a model of vigor and strength.



The Holstein Dairy of J. H. Putnam on Route No. 2, Aberdeen, So. Dakota, is widely and favorably known. For several years Mr. Putnam's health was so broken it was feared he could not continue to operate his dairy.

"I suffered a complete physical and nervous breakdown," he said recently. "I had neither strength nor vitality, but felt weak and exhausted all the time. Nerves tangled, head aching constantly, my life was a continuous misery. There seemed to be no hope; nothing I tried relieved me.

"Only when I gave Tanlac a trial did I notice any improvement. My appetite increased and my digestion was much better. For the first time in several years I began to feel strong and free from pain and nausea. I kept on taking Tanlac, growing sturdier all the time and very soon was a new man entirely. Since then I've enjoyed the finest health and go through the heaviest day's work without exhaustion. Tanlac deserves all the praise I can give it."

If you're feeling "off color" for any reason, try Tanlac. It is nature's own remedy, made of herbs, roots and barks. Your druggist has it. Over 52,000,000 bottles sold.

Curfew for Women

Magistrates in the little seaside town of Hastings, England, near where the Normans conquered King Harold in 1066, say that all women should be in their homes by ten o'clock at night. They were asked by a saloonkeeper, who wished to give a party to his women customers, for permission to keep his premises open after ten o'clock, the usual closing time. His application was refused on the ground that all women should be in their homes at that time.

Inscription Rock

MOST of us have cherished the possession of an album of autographs of relatives and friends, but when it comes to such treasures the state of New Mexico claims to possess the largest, and no doubt the oldest, autograph album in all America if not in all the world.

Known locally as El Morro and situated near the town of Wingate, it now is one of Uncle Sam's national monuments. This "album" consists of a huge rectangular-shaped rock of whitish sand-stone, its walls being almost straight up and down and some 200 feet tall, suggestive of a temple of extraordinary size. It is unique in that it has but four pages (sides) and was formed by nature ages and ages ago—its seamed and weather-worn sides plainly showing the ravages of centuries of time.

The existence of this massive album was undoubtedly known to the Indians long before the attention of white men was drawn to it in 1849 by Lieut. J. H. Simpson who "discovered" it while on a military expedition.

The surface of this rock is fine-grained and easy to scratch, which fact evidently led passers-by to form the habit of recording their passing, because its sides hold inscriptions without number—all very ancient, many in Spanish—the oldest still decipherable going back to 1606. Another records the fact that the "Most Illustrious Sir and Captain General of the Province of Mexico, for the King, our master," passed by here on the return from the village of Zuni, the 27th day of July of the year 1621.

There are also many crude drawings of snakes, suns, men and women.

Easter Sunrise Pilgrimage

TO THE west of the beautiful city of Riverside in southern California, in the valley of the Santa Ana river, stands a little mountain named Mount Ribidoux, in perpetual commemoration of the name of the first white settler in these parts, Louis Ribidoux.

This mountain rises 1,000 feet above the town, or 1,837 feet above the sea, and is unusual in that it is almost of solid granite, its summit being crowned with huge boulders. The local town folk have venerated this mountain and long ago wore a trail up it to enjoy the rare view from the top.

Army engineers then built a driveway to the top, going one way and descending another. After this road was formally dedicated, a rough-hewn cross was erected on the highest point to preserve the memory of the crosses of the mission days and Junipero Serra, the founder of the California missions.

This gave birth to the thought that something in the way of a community religious occasion be instituted here, out of which grew the Easter morning pilgrimage which has attraceed so much attention.

Easter sunrise is the greatest christian religious moment. It was reasoned, therefore, that if people saw a sunrise in connection with religious thought the two things would effect a marked religious stimulus for the community.

The first year but a little handful of persons gathered around the cross for this simple sunrise service. Eleven hundred automobiles were counted ascending the driveway to witness a recent service.

The Historic Potomac

THE historic Potomac river has played an important part in the development of America ever since the settlement of Jamestown, Va. The Pawtomax Indians lived along its lower banks and the name Potomac doubtless came about in this way.

This picturesque waterway—famed far and wide for its scenic beauty—rises in the Allegheny mountains and flows 'cross-country in a southeasterly direction for some 450 miles to the Chesapeake bay. On the way it obligingly acts as boundary line between Maryland and West Virginia and also between Maryland and Virginia.

It cuts through the Blue Ridge mountain, drops 90 feet in a series of falls near Washington, meets tide-water at Georgetown, D. C., is navigable from Washington to the bay but is not a heavy traffic carrier, and below Washington becomes an estuary varying in width from two and one-half to seven miles and ranging from twenty-five to two-hundred feet in depth.

Its geographic location is so strategically important that it has been repeatedly bathed in war and blood. In the early days it was the battleground of savage tribes. Then came encounters between early white settlers and the Indians. Many tragic battles of the Revolutionary war were fought in this region. Finally, when the Civil war broke out, it became a skirmish line from practically one end to the other, between the Union and the Confederate forces.

The activities of our first President, George Washington, were inseparably associated with the Potomac, and he died in a house which overlooked its peaceful waters.

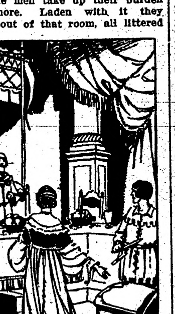
"Then you will not fear him dead," said she, and turned fiercely upon her equerry. "Here, Mario, you who have had the scourge and therefore need no longer fear it, pry off this lid. Give Matteo room to strike even in death."

But the duke waited for no more. Panic took him, too; and he was known to confess to it thereafter, adding that it was the only occasion in all his life upon which he had been face to face with fear, he who so often had looked death in the eyes without quailing.

"Blood of God!" he cried, and on that fierce oath he sprang from the table, and flung through the nearest window in the wake of his vanished court. Outside they heard him shouting for his horse, and they heard, too, the clamor of answering voices.

Within ten minutes he and his noble company were in the saddle, scudding through the night away from Castel della Pieve and the dread plague it harbored.

As that thunder of hoofs receded, Madonna Fulvia, who had remained by the coffin with no word spoken, bade the men take up their burden once more. Laden with it they passed out of that room, all littered with the now unheeded treasures that had been assembled in the duke's honor. Madonna and Mario walked ahead; the coffin was borne after them.



Give Matteo Room to Strike Even in Death.

When they had put a league or so between themselves and Citta della Pieve, she spoke for the first time.

"How was it with Giuberti today, Mario?" she asked.

"He died at noon, Madonna," was the answer. "God be praised, there is no other case of smallpox yet, and by His grace there will be none. Our precautions were well taken, and they will be to the end. Colomba herself dug his grave and gave him burial deep in the enclosed garden. The lazar-house was in flames when I left Pievano, so that all source of infection may be destroyed, and Colomba herself will set up a tent in the enclosure and abide there until all danger of her carrying the scourge is overpast."

"The good Colomba shall be rewarded, Mario. We are profoundly in her debt."

"A faithful soul," Mario admitted. "But there was no risk to her, since, like myself, she, too, has paid the price of immunity."

"That cannot lessen our gratitude," she said. And then she sighed. "Poor Giuberti! God rest his loyal soul! A faithful servant ever, he has served us even in death. Heaven has blessed us in the matter of servants, Mario. There is yourself—"

"I? I am but a clod," he interrupted. "I had not the wit to trust you today. Had you been dependent upon my service all must have miscarried and Heaven knows what fatality had been the end of this adventure."

"Which reminds me," said she, "that these poor fellows are unnecessarily laden. We have no pursuit to fear, and we shall make the better speed if we ease them of their burden." She drew rein as she spoke, and Mario with her. "Enough!" she called to those cowled figures that swung along behind her. "Empty it out."

Obediently they set down the coffin, forced up the lid, tilted it over, and rolled out the load of earth and stones that it contained.

She laughed softly in the dark when this was done. But Mario shuddered, bethinking him of the risk she had taken.

"God and His saints be thanked he did not dare to look," he said with fervor. "He has a reputation for his courage, and I feared . . . By the Host! how I feared!"

"Not more than I feared, Mario," she confessed, "but I also hoped; and if the chance was a desperate one it was still the only chance."

* * *

At Pievano some hours later she found her father so racked with anxiety by her continued absence and the circumstance that Mario had come and gone again that afternoon that he had summoned the fugitive Matteo Orsini from his hiding place to consult with him as to what measures should be taken.

Her appearance ended their travail of spirit, and the sight of them made an end of the fortitude that had so long upheld her. She flung herself upon her lover's breast, panting and trembling.

"You may sleep quiet now of nights, Matteo mine," she said. "He believes you dead, and fears you dead more than he could ever have feared you living." And on that she fainted in his arms, her strength of body and of spirit alike exhausted.

* * *

And that, so far as I can discover, is the only instance in which man or woman defeated the duke of Valentinois in an encounter of wits; nor does it lessen my high opinion of his penetration, for it must surely be admitted that the dice were heavily cogged against him, and that he fell a victim to a fraud rendered possible by circumstances. There is also responsible for this failure the fact that for once he did not choose his tool with that discrimination which Machiavelli enjoins upon princes. He overlooked the significance of those excessively full lips of Pantaleone's and left unheeded the warning Fra Serafino uttered on the score of them. Or perhaps, on the other hand— But why speculate? I have laid the facts before you, and you may draw your own inferences.

As for Pantaleone, if he still interests you, he fared on the whole perhaps better than he deserved, though that is purely a matter of the point of view from which he is to be judged. For, as the Lord Almerico's favorite philosopher has said, a man does not choose the part he shall play in life, he simply plays the part that is allotted to him.

He was entirely overlooked when Cesare with all his following left Citta della Pieve, and he was left there in the jail into which he had been flung until it should be ascertained whether he was to be required as a bridegroom. Anon Cesare remembered him, and was about to order him to be strangled when he learnt that the fellow had developed the smallpox and had been, very properly, taken to a lazar-house. It is recorded that upon hearing this the duke shuddered at the memory of his own escape, and was content to leave the rascal to the fate that had overtaken him—perhaps because he knew of no one who in the circumstances would undertake to strangle him.

Pantaleone's lusty youth stood him in such good stead that he made one of those rare recoveries from that pitiless scourge. But he came forth into the world again broken in health and strength, and no longer to be recognized for the same swaggering, arrogant captain who had sought sanctuary on that January evening at Pievano.

His career as a captain of fortune being ended, realizing that he was a broken and useless man, he dragged himself wearily back to the village of Laveno in the Bolognese, and stumbled one April morning into Leocadia's wine-shop; there he flung himself upon the charity and the ample bosom of the woman whom in prosperity he had forsaken. And such is the ever-forgiving and generous nature of your true woman that Leocadia put her arms about him and wept silently in thanksgiving for his return, blessing the disease that had made him weak and hideous since it had restored him to her.

Since it sorted well with his interest, I do not doubt that he made an honest woman of her.

Says Dangerous Varicose Veins Can Be Reduced at Home

Rub Gently and Upward Toward the Heart as Blood in Veins Flows That Way.

If you or any relative or friends are worried because of varicose veins, or bunches, the best advice that anyone in this world can give you is to ask your druggist for an original two-ounce bottle of Moone's Emerald Oil (full strength) and apply night and morning to the swollen, enlarged veins. Soon you will notice that they are growing smaller and the treatment should be continued until the veins are of normal size. So penetrating and powerful is Emerald Oil that even Piles are quickly absorbed. Your druggist sells lots of it.

Thawed by Electricity

Frozen water mains frequently are thawed out by electricity. In the dead of winter when all the houses in a section of the city find they cannot draw water at any of the faucets, the water department hears about it and appeals to the electric light and power company, which sends out an emergency crew. Electric power connections are made on hydrants at the two ends of the frozen section. The heat generated by the passage of the electricity through the pipes soon has water flowing freely again.

TWO GOOD REASONS

Why You Should Patronize A Co-operutive Creamery and Co-operative Marketing.

Co-operative Creameries pay best, because they give the patrons the manufacturers profit.

Co-operative Marketiing pays best, because it gives the creamery the middleman's profit.

A Real and Easy Test of Cream Separator Efficiency—Try it!

PUT a De Laval side-by-side with any other separator of approximate capacity. Mix 20 gallons of milk thoroughly and let it stay at normal room temperature of 70°. Run half through each machine. Wash the bowl and tinware of each in its own skim-milk. Then run the De Laval skim-milk through the other machine and vice versa. Weigh and test for butter-fat the cream each machine gets from the other's skim-milk. When you do this you will know beyond question of doubt that the De Laval skims cleaner, is easier to turn and is more profitable to own. Above are the results of such a test between a De Laval and another new separator of standard make. Note that the other machine left 25 times more butter-fat in the skim-milk than the De Laval did.

Liberal trade allowances made on old separators.

SCHOOL NOTES

The fifth and sixth grades will finish their booklets this week, which they are making to hold the rules for our flag.

They will paint the shield, which is to be used for the cover.

The sixth grade is finishing the study of Europe this week and will begin the study of Africa.

The English I class began the study of Ivanhoe on Monday.

The eighth grade Arithmetic class are studying measuring instruments, and thermometers, barometers, and hydrometers have been studied.

Government and local weather reports are used to illustrate the use of these instruments.

The seventh and eighth grade drawing classes are starting on simple perspective drawings. Objects such as boxes, books, and triangles were used to show the principle that all objects vanish to a point, as far as the edge is concerned. Drawings of simple buildings, roads, and trees in perspective will be the next problem.

Baseball is the big game on the school grounds at present. Some real "swatters" are exhibiting their skill. Why don't some one who is not interested in this spring sport make the first kite?

On Tuesday afternoon Mr. Pflughoef and Miss Schenck, assistant state club leaders, organized both boys' and girls' clubs in our school.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

We consider it a duty and privilege to take an active part in the upbuilding of every community we serve. We want to take our proper place in all local civic affairs and in addition are constantly working along our own lines to aid in the development of the territory.

We realize that our territory is largely agricultural and have spent thousands of dollars in the development of rural electrification. In consequence we have more farmer customers than any other company operating in the same states. Electricity properly applied makes better farm, better farmers and consequently better communities.

What human being does not love a mystery story? Especially one of those affairs in which a puzzling crime suddenly disturbs the lives of a group of people who have been going along in a normal way. All at once a deed of malevolence is committed which turns their placid little world topsy turvy. No one knows the perpetrator of the crime, but circumstances are such that any one of the apparently honest, sincere members of the group may come under suspicion. New angles of the affair and new mysteries develop, and a period of the most wracking suspense exists for all.

In this case there is no super-detective with his mathematics, his chemicals, his measuring devices and his methods of deduction to trap the criminal and, by the very completeness of the case against him, force him to a confession. No one but a few confused civilians and a couple of fairly astute law officers, both of the latter working in different directions and by the variance of their theories obstructing rather than aiding a solution. It was one of those crimes which seemed likely to remain a mystery unless some accident occurred to clear it up. And the accident did occur; one of the strangest accidents ever written into a mystery plot, and so terrifying in its effects that it brought a voluntary and quite unexpected confession from the guilty party.

Geraldine Bonner has written many clever stories and established herself as a master of thrill fiction.

PROLOGUE

One of the morning trains that tap the little towns along the sound ran into the Grand Central depot. The passengers, few in number—for it was midsummer and people were going out of town, not coming in—filed stragglingly up the long platform to the exit. One of them was a girl, fair and young, with those distinctive attributes of good looks and style that drew men's eyes to her face and women's to her clothes.

People watched her, noting the lithe grace of her movements, her delicate slimness, the froth of blonde hair that curled out under the brim of her hat. She appeared oblivious to the interests she aroused and this indifference had once been natural, for to be looked at and admired had been her normal right and become a stale experience. Now it was assumed, an armor under which she sought protection, hid herself from morbid curiosity and eagerly observing eyes. To be pointed out as Sybil Saunders, the actress, was a very different thing from being pointed out as Sybil Saunders, the fiancee of James Dallas of the Dallas-Parkinson case.

The Dallas-Parkinson case had been a sensation three months back. James Dallas, a well known actor, had killed Homer Parkinson during a quarrel in a men's club, and fled before the horrified onlookers could collect their senses. Dallas, a man of excellent character, had had many friends who claimed mitigating circumstances—Parkinson, drunk and brutal, had provoked the assault. But the Parkinson clan, new-rich oil people, breathing vengeance, had risen to the cause of their kinsman, poured out money in an effort to bring the fugitive to justice, and offered a reward of ten thousand dollars for his arrest. Of course Sybil Saunders had figured in the investigation, she was the betrothed of the murderer, their marriage had been at hand. She had gone through hours of questioning, relentless grilling, and had steadily maintained her ignorance of Dallas' whereabouts; from the night of his disappearance she had heard nothing from him and knew nothing of him. The Parkinsons did not believe her statement, the police were uncertain.

Her taxi rolled out into the sweltering heat, incandescent streets roaring under the blinding glare of the sun. Her destination was the office of Stroud and Walberg, theatrical managers. Mr. Walberg offered her a friendly hand and a chair. Mr. Walberg, a kindly Hebrew, was kindlier than ever to this particular visitor. He was sorry for her—as who in his profession was not—and wanted to help her along and here was his proposition:

A committee of ladies, a high society bunch summering up in Maine, wanted to give a play for charity. Thomas N. Driscoll, the spool-cotton magnate who was in California, had offered them his place up there—Gull island was the name—for an outdoor performance. The ladies had wanted a classic which Mr. Walberg opined was all right, seeing the show was for charity, and people could stand being bored for a worthy object. "Twelfth Night" was the play they had selected.

The ladies had placed the matter in Mr. Walberg's hands, and he had at once thought of Sybil Saunders for Viola. She was in his opinion the ideal person. Compensation was not so munificent, but then Miss Saunders was not yet in the star cast, and all expenses would be covered, including a week at Gull island.

He had no need for further persuasion, for Miss Saunders accepted at once. She was grateful to him and said so and looked as if she meant it. So, in a glow of mutual satisfaction, they walked to the door, Mr. Walberg telling over such members of the cast as had already been engaged—Sylvanus Grey for the Duke, Isabel Cornell for Maria, John Gordon Trevor for Sir Toby—no one could beat him, had the old English tradition—and Anne Tracy for Olivia. At that name Miss Saunders had exclaimed in evident pleasure. Anne Tracy would be perfect, and it would be so lovely having her, they were such friends.

"And I'm going to give you my best director, Hugh Bassett. If with you and him they don't pull off a success the Maine public's dumber than I thought."

Her business accomplished, Miss Saunders went home. She lived in one of those mid-town blocks of old brownstone houses divided into flats. Letting herself in with a latchkey she ascended the two flights at a rapid run, unlocked her door and entered upon the hot empty quietude of her own domain. She threw her hat on a chair, and falling upon the divan opened the paper that she had carried since she left the Grand Central station.

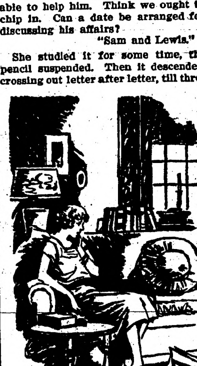
She folded the pages back at the personal column and settled over it, bent, motionless, her eyes traveling down its length. Suddenly they stopped, focused on a paragraph. She took a pad and pencil from the desk, drew a small table up to the divan, spread the newspaper on it, and copied the paragraph onto the pad. It ran as follows:

"Sister Carrie:

"Edmund stoney broke but Albert able to help him. Think we ought to chip in. Can a date be arranged for discussing his affairs?

"Sam and Lewis."

She studied it for some time, the pencil suspended. Then it descended, crossing out letter after letter, till three words remained—"Edmonton, Alberta, Canada." The signature she guessed as the name he went by.



Now He Had Grown Bolder, Telling Her Where He Was.

She burned the written paper, grinding it to powder in the ash tray. The newspaper she threw into the wastebasket where Luella, the mulatto woman who "did up" for her, would find it in the morning. She felt certain Luella was paid to watch her. But she had continued to keep the evil-eyed creature, fearful that her dismissal would make them more than ever wary, strengthen their suspicion that Sybil Saunders was in communication with her lover.

The deadly danger of it was cold at her heart. She had heard directly from him once, a letter the day after he had fled; the only one that even he, reckless in his despair, had dared to send. In that he had told her to watch the personal column in a certain paper and had given her the names by which she could identify the paragraphs. She had watched and twice found the veiled message and twice waited in sickening fear for discovery. It had not happened. Now he had grown bolder, telling her where he was—it was as if his hand beckoned her to come. She could write to him at last, do it this evening and take it out after dark. Lying very still, her hands clasped behind her head, she ran over in her mind letter boxes, post offices where she might mail it. Were the ones in crowded districts or those in secluded byways, the safest? It was like walking through grasses where live wires were hidden.

A ring at the bell made her leap to her feet with wild visions of detectives. But it was only Anne Tracy, come in to see if she was back from her visit on the sound. It was a comfort to see Anne, she always acted as if things were just as they had been and never asked disturbing questions.

She was Sybil's best friend, was to have been her bridesmaid. But she knew no more of Sybil's secrets since Jim Dallas had disappeared than any one else. And she never sought to know—that was why the friendship held.

They had a great deal to talk about, but chiefly the "Twelfth Night" affair. Anne was immensely pleased that Sybil had agreed to play. She did not say this—she avoided any allusions to Sybil's recent conducting of her life—but her enthusiasm about it all was irresistible. It warmed the sad-eyed girl into interest; the Viola costume was brought from its cupboard, the golden wig tried on. When Anne took her departure late in the day, she felt much relieved about her friend—she was "coming back," coming alive again.

Anne occupied another little flat on another of the mid-town streets in another of the brownstone houses. Hers was one room larger, for her brother, Joe Tracy, lived with her when not pursuing his profession on the road. There were hiatuses in Joe's pursuit during which he inhabited a small bedroom in the rear and caused Anne a great deal of worry and expense. Joe apparently did not worry, certainly not about the expense. Absence of work wore on his temper not because Anne had to carry the flat alone, but because he had no spending money.

They said it was his temper that stood in his way. Something did, for he was an excellent actor with that power of transforming himself into an empty receptacle to be filled by the character he portrayed. But directors who had had experience of him, talked about his "natural meanness" and shook their heads. People who tried to be sympathetic with Anne about him got little satisfaction. All the most persistent ever extracted was an admission that Joe was "difficult." Hugh Bassett had boosted and helped and lectured him. And not for love of Joe, for in his heart Bassett thought him a pretty hopeless proposition.

That evening, alone in her parlor, Anne was thinking about him. He had no engagement and no expectation of one, and it was not wise to leave him alone in the flat without occupation. She went to the window and leaned out. The air rose from the street, breathless and dead, the heated exhalation of walls and pavements baked all day by the merciless sun. To leave Joe to this while she was basking in the delights of Gull island—apart from anything he might do—it wasn't fair. And then suddenly the expression of her face changed and she drew in from the window—Hugh Bassett was coming down the street.

The bell rang, she pushed the button and presently he was at the door saying he was passing and thought he'd drop in for a minute. He was a big thick-set man with a quiet reposeful quality unshaken even by the heat. He had dropped in a great deal this summer and as the droppings-in became more frequent Anne's outside engagements became less. They always simulated a mutual surprise, giving them time to get over that somewhat breathless moment of meeting.

They achieved it rather better than usual tonight for their minds were full of the same subject. Bassett had come to impart the good news about Sybil and Anne had seen her and heard all about it. Finally when they had thrashed out all the matters of first importance Bassett said:

"Did you tell her that Walberg wanted Aleck Stokes for the Duke?"

"No, I didn't say a word about it. What was the use? It would only have upset her and you'd put a stop to it."

Nye's One Experience With Cyclone Enough

I have not the necessary personal magnetism to look a cyclone in the eye and make it quail. I am stern and even haughty in my intercourse with men, but when a Manitoba simoon takes me by the brow of my pantaloons and throws me across township 28, range 18, west of the fifth principal meridian, I lose my mental reserve and become anxious and even taciturn.

As the people came into the forest with lanterns and pulled me out of the crotch of a basswood tree with a "tackle and fall," I remember I told them I didn't yearn for any more atmospheric phenomena.

The cyclone is a natural phenomenon, enjoying the most robust health. It may be a pleasure for a man with great will power and an iron constitution to study more carefully into the habits of a cyclone, but as far as I am concerned I could worry along some way if we didn't have a phenomenon in the house from one year's end to the other. As I sit here, with my leg in a silicate of soda corset and watch the merry throng promenading down the street, I cannot repress a feeling toward a cyclone that almost amounts to disgust.—From "Bill Nye, His Own Life Story," by Frank W. Nye.

The General Grant Tree

THE General Grant is the only tree in America to have a national park named for it. The General Grant National park was created for the sole purpose of preserving this grand old patriarch.

This mastodonic sequoia is 264 feet high, over 100 feet in circumference, estimated to be over 4,000 years old and contains approximately 1,000,000 feet of lumber. Its park covers about 2,500 acres on the western slope of the Sierra Nevada mountains in California.

John Muir, the naturalist, lived among the sequoias. He penned this beautiful word picture about them:

"No description can give any adequate idea of their singular majesty, much less of their beauty. Only in youth does it show like other conifers a heavenward yearning, keenly aspiring with a long, quick-growing top. Indeed the whole tree for the first century or two, or until 100 to 150 feet high, is arrowhead in form, and, compared with the solemn rigidity of age, is as sensitive to the wind as a squirrel tail. The lower branches are gradually dropped as it grows older and the upper ones thinned out till comparatively few are left. These, however, are developed to great size, divide again and again, and terminate in well-rounded masses of leafy branchlets, while the head becomes dome-shaped. Then poised in fullness of structure and beauty, stern and solemn in mien, it glows with eager, enthusiastic life, quivering to the top of every branch and far-reaching root, calm as a granite dome; the first to feel the touch of the rosy beams of the morning, the last to bid the sun good night."

Our Tallest Battle Monument

PICTURESQUELY situated in a lovely valley at the foot of the Green mountains in the southwestern corner of Vermont is the peaceful village of Bennington, settled in 1761. Here, on August 16, 1777, when the British attempted to capture the supplies housed in the continental storehouse, was fought the battle of Bennington, between the British army and the New Hampshire militia.

Here, atop State-Arms hall, overlooking scenes of great natural beauty and the graves of the heroic dead, on August 19, 1891—the centennial anniversary of the admission of Vermont to the Union—there was dedicated Vermont's first historical monument, erected by the states of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont and the national government, at a cost approximating $115,000. President Benjamin Harrison was among those present and addressed the assembled multitude.

This simple but lofty granite pile is said to be the highest battle memorial in the world. It is 37 feet square at the ground and over 300 feet high. Its walls are 7 feet 6 inches thick. New England granite was used in its construction. Its sides draw in slightly as its height progresses. About two-thirds of the way up there are a number of openings through which sightseers may view the surrounding landscape. These openings are reached by a steel and wrought-iron stairway built within the monument. There are 84 landings and 412 steps in this stairway.

A silent sentinel, keeping watch over this peaceful valley, this great war memorial stands in mute testimony to generations to come of the struggle for liberty which here took place.

Kings Chapel Burying Ground

SLOPING away from busy Tremont street in the older section of Boston, hedged in between the city hall, modern skyscrapers and a moving-picture theater, is a small plot of hallowed ground dotted with time-scarred grave stones.

This is Kings Chapel burying ground, the first burial plot in Boston. It dates back to 1630. In it rest Mary Chilton Winslow, the first white woman that stepped on American soil when the Mayflower landed at Plymouth Rock; Capt. John Winthrop, the first governor of Massachusetts; his son, John, Jr., who was governor of Connecticut; John Davenport, who founded the city of New Haven; Edward Bromfield, who built the first pipe organ in America; Henry Prentice, member of the Boston tea party; Elizabeth Payne Hester Prynne, the heroine in Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter," who died November 26, 1704.

Many of the markers of these graves are simple wooden affairs which are renewed from time to time. The oldest grave stone in Boston is said to mark the grave of William Paddy. This particular greenish-colored stone, 'tis said, was once removed from the grave and was lost for a number of years, only to be unearthed unexpectedly near the old city hall. It carries this inscription: "Here lyeth the body of Mr. William Paddy. Departed this life August 28, 1658," together with this peculiar verse—"Here sleaps that blesed one whoes lief God help us all to live that so when tiem shall be that we this world must lieve we ever shall be happy with blesed William Paddy."

Kills Self to Show He Has Sense of Honor

Berlin.—Because he got bad school reports and was reproached by his teacher as "dishonorable," eleven-year-old Franz Zoellner, of Frankfurt, shot and killed himself with his father's revolver.

Franz, who was a backward child, found it hard to keep up with the strenuous regime in German schools, where the pre-war stuffing system, so much criticized in America, has not been radically reformed.

His backwardness led the teacher to reprimand him and the boy was ordered to tell his parents they should come to the school for a conference. Franz could not summon the courage to tell his parents, so they were informed through a classmate.

During the parent-teacher conference Franz was reproached by the teacher as dishonorable for not informing his parents as instructed, whereupon the child said grimly, "I will show you I have a sense of honor."

A few hours later he was dead.

RAT TERRIERS ARE MOTHERED BY HEN

Discouraged Over Hatching Eggs, She Takes Puppies.

Kingston, N. C.—Mrs. A. T. Edwards, residing four miles from here, reports a remarkable barnyard family at her home. A white Wyandotte hen is mothering seven rat terrier pups. She is making a good job of it.

The hen is merely a pullet in age, a flighty, rattle brained fowl. A few weeks ago Mrs. Edwards put a dozen eggs under the broody bird. She sat on the eggs a short time, then left the nest in disgust.

"The mother of the puppies, the prettiest animals imaginable, made them a home close by the hen's nest," says the owner. "When the pullet sailed off the nest, tired of setting, she discovered the puppies. She may have been near-sighted and thought they were fluffy chickens, but I am inclined to think she didn't care what they were just so she could hover them.

"The mother of the pups was a gentle little beast. The hen picked a row with her and eventually chased her away. Then she started hovering the doggies.

"She leaves them only a few minutes at a time, just long enough to eat and get an occasional drink of water. When she runs out of the shed with her wings spread and clucks to the breed they run to her on their bowed legs and the result is laughable.

"Of course, they will not eat what the hen scratches up for them. I get the food for them and place it before them. Then the hen stands off, surveys the situation and decides it is all right. After they have eaten she herds the whole bunch back into the box and settles down over them."

Takes 30-Mile Swim in Tank of Engine

Yazoo City, Miss.—Bill Baxter of Kokomo, Ind., holds the railroad swimming record of the world.

No cheering throng greeted Bill as he arrived at Yazoo City after his 30-mile swim from West, Miss. In fact, he would have arrived unnoticed except for an Illinois Central yardmaster.

"How did you get so wet in a box car?" the yardmaster asked as he stopped Bill from leaving a freight.

"Box car! I've been in the dark and damp interior of that big 2,000-gallon tender and I've got a world record for long-distance swimming," Bill replied.

Bill related how he boarded the train, but was forced to drop through the manhole of the tender to escape a brakeman. He found the water too low to reach the top and a little too high to reach the bottom. Accordingly, he enjoyed a 30-mile swim until the water became low enough for him to reach the bottom.

"Now I guess you will turn me over to the bulls," said Bill.

"No, you must have a Wrigley prize, and here's a half dollar," said the yardmaster.

Starved for Love, She Rode With Postman

Detroit, Mich.—Starved for affection and accepting the postman's offer for rides in his "chariot" seems to be half of the woe in the life of Mrs. Irene Bailey, thirty-six years old, who is suing Wray Bailey, a farmer of near Wayne, for divorce.

Wray is asking a decree on a cross bill.

Mrs. Bailey testified to having endured her husband's bitterness for nearly sixteen years, and under cross-examination admitted having become infatuated with the neighborhood postman and having accompanied him along his route. But Mrs. Bailey condoned her action.

"My husband has had affairs with a number of women. I needed a friend and I found one," she testified.

The postman was not named. Mrs. Bailey is seeking the custody of their four children.

A Word With the Old Folks

Elderly People Are Learning Importance of Good Elimination.

IN the later years of life there is apt to be a slowing up of the bodily functions. Good elimination, however, is just as essential to the old as to the young. Many old folks have learned the value of Doan's Pills when a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys is required. Scanty or burning passages of kidney secretions are often signs of improper kidney function. In most every community are scores of users and endorsers who acclaim the merit of Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

How Many Are "You-All?"

A reader complains, in the Adventure Magazine, that the expression "you-all" is often used in Western or Southern stories as applying to one person, which, he says, is never done in reality.

Another reader reports having heard the expression in Massachusetts, Ohio, Washington and from a gatekeeper at a New York city ferry, and that it often is used in the singular. Is there any rule about this?

Fish Have Nicknames

As a rule sea fish, not river fish, have nicknames. The red mullet, for instance, is often called the sea woodcock because of its taste, and the dab is sometimes known as salter.

Fishermen call the hake the sea pike because its shape is a little like that of the pike, and they term a flounder a flock or fluka.

One of the gurnards has the name of cuckoogurnard, by reason of the odd sound it makes when caught.

MAINTAIN LARGE SNAKE VILLAGE

Venom Extracted for Serum to Cure Bites.

Boston, Mass.—Harvard university, the United States and the United Fruit company are co-operating through the Antivenin Institute of America to maintain "the largest and most modern snake village in the world" in a war against snake poisoning.

The village, which has a capacity of 5,000 scaly inhabitants, is at Tela, Honduras. Dr. Afranio do Amaral of Brazil is director. He recently made a flying trip from Central America to lecture before the Harvard school of public health.

The village is a concrete-walled inclosure, roofed with palm leaves, and containing 16 houses divided into three apartments each with two shallow drinking basins.

There the venom is extracted from the captives and shipped to Glenolden, Pa., where horses are gradually inoculated with it. Their immunized blood makes a serum which is used to protect human life from the venom of snake bites.

The yellow chin, or fer-de-lance, is the most common of the dangerous snakes of that section. There is also the eyelash snake, or horned viper; the cascebla rattler, and the coral snake.

The institute also has a station at San Antonio, Texas, which is aided by the army, and this station captured 4,000 rattlesnakes in a four-month period last fall. Seventy-two bites were reported to the station in a three-month period, and twenty-six of those bitten were given the serum. None of these died, but 85 per cent of those not treated died.

The principles of antivenin treatment were developed by the state of Sao Paulo, Brazil. There the antivenin is distributed to the farmers, but Doctor Amaral believes the best means of distribution here is through the drug stores. In Brazil hunters or cattle riders in snake-infested territory may obtain small syringes containing the serum.

Kills Himself When Told by Son to Drop German

Los Angeles, Calif.—Herman F. Bestmann, Sr., seventy-six years old, once a wealthy tavernkeeper in Germany, who came here to live with his son after the vicissitudes of the World war had wiped out his fortune, chose death by his own hand because he could not fit into his new surroundings. His lifeless body was found late in the day, suspended by a piece of hemp fastened over a door in his room.

"What you told me drives me to my death. You are my murderer," read a note addressed to his son.

The son, Herman F. Bestmann, Jr., a contractor, told police that he had objected to the use of German in his home. When the father came here, he brought along his young wife. She was his fourth.

"In my father's presence I ordered my stepmother not to bring German friends into the house, and further admonished her that English should be spoken, as my wife does not understand German," the son explained.

Armless Sydney Girl Is Clever With Her Toes

Sydney.—A fifteen-year-old Sydney girl is a wonderful example of the triumph of human perseverance and will power over physical misfortune. Crippled from birth and robbed of the use of both hands and arms, she has learned to write more legibly than the average person and perform other things with her toes.

For writing, the girl holds the pen or pencil between the first two toes of her right foot and steadies the pad with her left. Her "hand" is neater and more easily read than over 80 per cent of hundreds of normal writers taken at random from schools and offices.

In addition, the girl paints, stencils, knits and does all kinds of sewing with her feet. She can thread a needle with them.

SCIENCE FINDS CRAB OF NOCTURNAL HABIT

Ecuador Beaches Are Filled With Strange Species.

Washington.—A crab which haunts the beaches by night and hides in the daytime is among the interesting specimens obtained by Dr. Waldo L. Schmitt of the Smithsonian institution on an expedition in South America. Doctor Schmitt found the beaches at Santa Elena, Ecuador, honeycombed with crabs of this species, the ocypodes. In the daytime they are not to be seen. At night they are dazzled by flashes and can easily be picked up.

Doctor Schmitt, who is curator of marine invertebrates at the National museum, under the Smithsonian, left here four months ago to make a survey of crabs, shrimps and similar forms along the west coast of South America. He writes that he has just passed through the Straits of Magellan and has arrived at Punta Arenas, whence he will go to the Falkland islands to conclude his explorations.

Scientist Travels Alone.

Doctor Schmitt is traveling alone, seeking specimens of marine crustacea and packing his finds with only such native help as can be obtained. He has touched at many points in Ecuador, Peru and Chile, conducting a survey of the principal areas where crustacean forms are to be found in abundance. In Ecuador Doctor Schmitt also found specimens of the genus upogebia, rare animals that have never been found on the west coast before. They are tiny shrimp-like crustacea, able to bore holes in stone. An entirely new species of crab, it is thought, was discovered by Doctor Schmitt among other tiny porcellanids attached to sea urchins.

The purpose of Doctor Schmitt's expedition is to enlarge the scientific knowledge of marine forms. There has previously been little knowledge of the fauna on the west coast of South America. Doctor Schmitt has been looking particularly for specimens of crabs which will help Miss Mary J. Rathbun, an associate of the Smithsonian institution, in making complete her monograph on the crabs of America, two volumes of which have already been published. He is also sending many specimens of algae to William Randolph Taylor, a botanist at the University of Pennsylvania, who is making a special study in this field. In addition, Doctor Schmitt is considering the economic possibilities in connection with shrimps and crabs in the territory he is covering.

Uses Dredges and Hand Nets.

In collecting specimens Doctor Schmitt uses dredges and hand nets. Because of the difficulty of getting motor boats in the places visited he is able to make little use of the dredges. Most of the specimens are picked up by hand. Doctor Schmitt has with him several collection chests, fitted with bottles, and several sixteen-gallon tanks for conveying the specimens. Some he has shipped in gasoline tins found along the way. The crustacea are put in 70 per cent alcohol and the algae in a weak solution of formalin.

The trip is financed by the Walter Rathbone Bacon traveling scholarship, established at the Smithsonian institution by Mrs. Virginia Purdy Bacon. A valuable byproduct of the expedition is the strengthening of relationships with the governments and scientific bodies in the countries visited.

Loss of Finger Tip Holds Man as Bandit

Battle Creek, Mich.—Through the loss of the end of the little finger of his left hand, Jack Promise, thirty-three years old, has been identified as one of two bandits who recently attempted an oil filling station holdup here.

One of the bandits lost the end of his finger during the attempted robbery, when the wife of the oil proprietor bit it off. Promise was identified positively, officers said.

Everett Brown, twenty-nine years old, of this city is being held in Kalamazoo county jail in connection with the holdups in that city. He was arrested here and is said to have been identified by one of his victims. Brown is a brother of Melvin Brown, now serving a sentence in the Marquette branch prison in connection with the slaying of Alex Dombroski, a Wayne county farmer, several years ago.

UNKNOWN SPECIES OF ANIMAL FOUND

Different From Any Described in Natural History.

Estelline, Texas.—In the white gypsum hills near here there was recently found a colony of little animals, the identity of which has not been established. They are apparently of a species different from any described in natural history. One of the animals was captured by C. E. Miller and is kept by him as a pet. It has a soft black-and-white fur, the white extending over its back and underneath its stomach like a wide girdle. White cuffs adorn each paw.

Its front paws resemble human hands, and the black four fingers, hairy, are remindful of the legs of a giant tarantula. Its hind paws are black and have long claws which enable it to climb and scratch. It is particular about them, and keeps them polished.

A face, sharp pointed, peers out from a background of fuzzy mustache, much like that on a monkey's face. Its nose is smooth and sleek like hard rubber. Its neck is small and can be spanned with the thumb and forefinger of an ordinary-size hand.

The animal stands 30 inches high and weighs 20 pounds. It has strong white teeth made for tearing, apparently, but it refuses to eat meats of any kind or fish. It is strictly vegetarian.

Jewelry of 10,000 B. C. Found in London Garden

London.—Fifteen feet of solid history dating from 10,000 B. C. have been discovered in what is certainly the only virgin soil in London and believed to be the only virgin ground to be found in any city in the world. This small tract of land, which has never been built on, is right in the heart of the city behind a court off Fleet street.

Discovery of the unique archeological value of the vacant lot was made when Hugh S. Gordon, who is a mining engineer, rented it from the Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' company as a vegetable allotment to keep himself fit. Finds in the earth already made date from the Paleolithic, Neolithic and Iron ages, continuously upward to Saxon times about 800 A. D. Then there is a gap until the Thirteenth century, from which time there has been exhumed an extraordinary wealth of historic relics.

The gem of the treasures dug out to date is an exquisite Cretan jewel recognized as part of a collar brought by the Phoenicians when they came to trade with the early Britons. The complete excavation of the site is expected to take three years.

Indians of U. S. to Race Against 2 Tarahumaras

Austin, Texas.—Crack American Indian runners from the Haskell institute will be pitted against the two famous Tarahumara Indians of Mexico in an endurance run between San Antonio and Austin, 82 miles, as one of the notable features of the third annual Texas relays to be held under the auspices of the athletic department of the University of Texas, March 25, according to L. Theo. Bellmont, director.

This marathon will be over the post highway that runs between San Antonio and Austin. The Tarahumara Indian entries have aroused the greatest interest in athletic circles. The fact that they broke the world's long-distance running record several weeks ago in a jaunt which they made between Pueblo and Mexico City, 82 miles, brought to them international attention.

The Tarahumaras are now in their village home in a remote part of the Sierra Madres, in western Chihuahua.

Germans Find Oxygen Is Seasickness Cure

Berlin.—As a remedy for seasickness, German physicians describe the inhalation of oxygen as most efficient.

After the inhalation of the gas for three to four minutes, the patient is said to find immediate relief, even the feeling of nausea ceasing.

German medical experts attribute the beneficial effects of oxygen in this connection to its powerful influence in alleviating an anaemic state of the brain, which they say is one of the pronounced phenomena of seasickness.

Paris.—A marshal of France, the highest military honor and command—that given Foch, Joffre and four others—gets a salary of 90,000 francs a year, or $10 a day, under the new scale.

Officers grade down from this pay to that of a second lieutenant, who draws $32 a month during the early part of his career.

There are small allowances, but so small that an officer must have some independent fortune or be so poor as to risk having to make humiliating economies.

If Back Hurts Begin on Salts

Flush Your Kidneys Occasionally by Drinking Quarts of Good Water

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Too much rich food creates acids which clog the kidney pores so that they sluggishly filter or strain only part of the waste and poisons from the blood. Then you get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, constipation, dizziness, sleeplessness, bladder disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage, or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin to drink soft water in quantities; also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any reliable pharmacy and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity, also to help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive and cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone can take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and the blood pure, thereby often preventing serious kidney complications.

STATE WILL BUILD FOUR HIGHWAY SHOPS

Bids Asked for Maintenance Offices At Crookston, Duluth, Morris and Willmar

Maintenance district shops and office buildings will be built by the State Highway department this summer at Crookston, Duluth, Morris and Willmar, according to announcement by Commissioner C. M. Babcock. Sites have been acquired in these four cities and bids for the erection of the buildings will be opened by the Department of Administration and Finance at 10 a. m., March 29.

The erection of state owned buildings for the district maintenance headquarters is a move in the interest of economy as well as efficiency. A central shop was built by the department on the State Fair grounds ten years ag. The first district building was built at Hopkins and the experiment proved so successful that the department determined to provide similar buildings for all the sixteen districts. Buildings were erected last year at Rochester, Brainerd, Bemidji and Detroit Lakes, and it is expected that the other districts will all have new buildings within two years.

The need of well equipped shops in each district became more urgent since the department undertook to keep the roads open in winter. Snow removal operations make it necessary to have a convenient place where plows, trucks and tractors can be repaired quickly and kept in readiness for quick action when snow storms come.

Each building will contain offices for the district superintendent and his clerical force, and shops for the repair and storage of trucks, graders, snow plows and other equipment used in road maintenance in the district. A standard plan, used for all the buildings last year, will also be used for the new buildings. They will be 60 by 130, of solid brick walls, one story high with heating plant and fuel room in the basement. Each building will have a paint shop, machine shop, stock room and oil storage room. The estimated cost, including heating and plumbing, electrical work and machinery, is about $31,000.

Bids will be received on each building separately, to encourage bidding by local contractors. Plans and specifications are on file at the central office of the Highway department, 1246 University avenue, St. Paul, at the offices of the department of administration and finance, State Capitol, and at the offices of the district superintendents in the four cities. The building at Crookston is to be completed July 1, those at Morris and Willmar August 1, and the one at Duluth September 1.

LEGION OUTLINES LAWS TO STATE LEGISLATURE

Expresses Appreciation of Co-operation With Servicemen of North Star State

Guardianship regulations, Alien school teachers, registration of soldiers' graves, child welfare amendments, continuation of soldier welfare board, continuation of military training in colleges, the legalization of boxing in second, third and fourth class cities and villages over 5,000, a resident fishing license, support of the two soldiers' rest camps, and endorsement of forest conservation and reforestation, are the subjects dealt with in the Minnesota Legion's recent message to members of the state legislature, R. A. Rossberg of Crookston, state legislative chairman report.

In addition, Mr. Rossberg and his committeemen Frank Clark of Northfield and Louis L. Collins of Minneapolis, declared that Minnesota Legionnaires are opposed to any change in legal holidays, and do not favor changing the soldier preference law at this time; explained that while the Legion favors a state memorial to commemorate the deeds of hero dead, it does not push this project now. The state legislature is urged to request increased hospital beds for disabled veterans from the federal government, and to ask Congress to pass the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill which grants justice to disabled emergency officers of the world war.

Mrs. W. D. Villars of St. Paul, Minnesota Legion Auxiliary chairman, declares her organization is unanimously behind the Legion program. She and Mr. Rossberg call attention to the fact that their committees cannot indorse proposed legislation not approved by the previous state convention. Into this class falls the Birch Cooley State Memorial Park and Soldiers' Rest which Renville county favors. As it was not discussed at the Mankato Convention the Legion is neither for nor against it. It is not on the Legions official legislative program.

The special committee of senators and representatives that went to Omaha and Lincoln to study the Nebraska bank guaranty law have filed a report in which they advise against the enactment of a similar law in Minnesota under existing conditions. As we predicted some time ago, sentiment among legislators is against any kind of guaranty plan, and if any changes at all are made in the present banking laws, it will simply take the form of more stringent control on the part of the state department of banks.

TAX IS SMALL PART OF AUTO EXPENSE

Proposed Increase In Road Fund Would Reduce Total Vehicle Cost, Is Contention

Automobile license and gas taxes, which together are now less than 5 per cent of the cost of operating the average car, would be less than 6½ per cent of the average operating cost if the proposed increases recommended by Commissioner C. M. Babcock are approved by the Legislature.

Readers of the Sheaf, whether they approve Mr. Babcock's recommendations or not, may be interested in some figures contained in this week's highway bulletin, which says that the average license in 1926 was $15.54. Mr. Babcock advocates increasing the basic rate from 2.4 to 2.75 per cent. This would make the average fee $18.98. The gas tax averaged $7.77 per car in 1926. An increase from 2 to 3 cents per gallon would make the average $11.65. On a 100 mile trip, with a small or medium car, your "toll" would be 15 instead of 10 cents. The license and gas taxes together [illegible] $23.41 per car. If both increases are granted, the average would be $30.63.

The cost of operating the average car, including depreciation, fuel, repairs, tires, taxes, service, storage and incidentals, is $500. Would an increase of $7.22 in the average tax make the average operating cost $507.2 per year? Most experienced motorists, who have seen their gasoline consumption, tire wear and repair bills reduced each year since road improvement began in earnest, will say that instead of an increase there would be an actual reduction. Others would likely say that they would drive more miles, use their cars more days in the year and get more enjoyment for the same money.

Even if the increased funds would not bring highway improvements in every county the first year, it would not be long before the benefit would be felt, for the improvement of some of the roads which carry the heaviest traffic and which are expensive to maintain, would release these maintenance funds for use elsewhere, and in a year or two every county, would benefit directly. But in this age when it is a common thing to drive across the state in a day, almost every automobile owner will benefit directly not only from highway improvements in his own county but from work done in every adjoining county.

On the bond question Mr. Babcock states that while he will not make a fight for a bond issue and has not even had the bill introduced at this session, he asks motorists to remember that issuing bonds will neither increase automobile taxes, nor will highway bonds in any manner increase general taxes, now or in the future. They would simply bring some of the needed highway improvements sooner, and the improvements would reduce maintenance costs so that the principal and interest could be paid from future receipts of the highway department.

Land O'Lakes Annual Meeting Well Attended

The sixth annual meeting of Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc., was held at the Minneapolis headquarters on Thursday and Friday of last week and was attended by 4,500 dairymen, representing 425 cooperative creameries located in Minnesota and Western Wisconsin, comprising the Land O'Lakes organization.

According to the report of H. F. Meyers, sales manager, the association in 1926, sold 92,260,193 pounds of butter, which mostly was distributed among 200 firms located in 82 different cities in the United States. The Twin Cities consumed 1,500,000 pounds of the product. Chain stores were the largest individual purchasers of Land O' Lakes butter, taking 37,000,000 pounds. Jobbers took another 42,000,000, while ice cream manufacturers accounted for 4,000,000 and milk distributers disposed of 1,000,00 pounds to their patrons.

By raising the standard of the Land O'Lakes butter to 93 per cent and above, an additional profit of $211,000 was accumulated through the higher prices obtained. Total sales of the organization were $39,851,655.92.

Red Clover Seed in Minnesota Scarce--Big Supply of Alfalfa

Many New Alfalfa Growers Will Plant Seed This Spring and Will Increase Acreage

With alfalfa seed selling generally under the price of red clover, farmers all over Minnesota are sowing alfalfa this spring in place of red clover. Nineteen dollars a hundred pounds is being asked for hardy alfalfa seed, compared to $40 a hundred for red clover seed, while in many communities even Grimm, that hardiest of all varieties of alfalfa, recommended where there is any danger of winter killing, is selling as low as $34 per hundred pounds.

The comparatively low price of alfalfa seed this year is due to a good crop last season in both the United States and Canada. On the other hand, an extraordinary poor harvest of red clover seed in 1926 resulted in one of the smallest seed crops of that legume in many years. As a consequence, the supply of good clover seed is not sufficient this year to meet the normal demands. Last year, approximately 86,000,000 pounds of red clover seed were available, while this year the supply is estimated at less than 60,000,000 pounds. The supply of good alfalfa seed available for planting this year's new crop is around 60,000,000 pounds, which is nearly the same as last year's supply, the largest in history.

The scarcity and extremely high price of red clover seed, however, is but one important reason why alfalfa is more popular than red clover this year. The other reasons for the greater popularity of alfalfa this year are its superiority to red clover in all rotations, including the short or three-year rotation, its better quality hay, its high acre yield, its greater returns per acre whether fed or sold, its greater effectiveness in combating noxious weeds, and its more ready establishment in dry years.

EARLY SPRING MOTORING CALLS FOR CAUTION

Usual Crop of Sunny Sunday Afternoon Accidents Can Be Reduced By Careful Driving

With the approach of warmer spring days and better roads, the usual spring increase in motoring is due. Car owners in Marshall county who have laid up their cars for the winter, or used them only for necessary business will soon be taking more or less extended pleasure drives with their families or friends.

It is a good time to think, talk and plan for safety, says a State Highway bulletin. On some of these nice sunny spring days, particularly Sunday afternoons, it sometimes seems as if all the people had decided to take a ride at the same time. Such afternoons usually bring a big crop of accidents, and most of them could be avoided.

Perhaps the wheel feels strange after several weeks of no-driving. Perhaps the needed check-up on steering gear, tires, idling adjustment and other important parts of the old bus has been neglected. Perhaps the temptation to look around at new buildings and other changes made during the winter leads to accidents. Perhaps it is a brand new machine and an inexperienced driver in unexpectedly heavy traffic.

When driving on such days, it is well to use all your usual caution, and then some. First of all, see that you drive carefully and observe all the traffic rules. Then go a little farther and make some allowance for what the other fellow is going to do. He may not be a perfect driver; leave an extra large margin of safety.

Keep your eye open for "stop" signs. The black and yellow octagonal "stop" signs are used only at railroad crossings or arterial highways where the law requires a full stop. Even if you are sure no train is coming, stop just for the sake of setting a good example.

Be careful in making turns. A sweep to the right before turning left, or a sweep to the left before turning right, is dangerous and obstructs traffic. Be sure and signal before making left turns, and drive in the center lane before turning. Drive in the right lane when you intend to make a right turn.

Be sure your lights are O. K. before attempting night driving. Be careful in passing other vehicles. Remember you have no right to go left of the center of the street or highway if it will obstruct a vehicle coming the other way. Do not pass other cars at hill tops or sharp turns.

Remember that roads will not be perfect during the spring break up. There may be ruts and slippery places. Regulate your speed to the average traffic. Speeding and snail-gaiting on crowded roads are both dangerous.

Be careful about stopping and parking. If you must stop on the highway, give an adequate signal. Do not park on the traveled portion of the highway and do not park without adequate lights at night.

STATE PROPERTY IS VALUED AT SIX BILLION

Report of Tax Commission Shows Decided Increases in Value of Livestock and Farm Buildings

Full and true value of all kinds of property in Minnesota was estimated at $6,667,617,283, a considerable increase over other years in a report completed last week by the state tax commission.

The estimate is based on valuations and assessments made during 1926 which showed an increase in property subject to the ad valorem tax of $24,927,458 over the 1924 value.

True and full value for this property which includes real estate, personal property, money and credits and telegraph companies is fixed at $5,817,617,283 compared with $5,792,689,825.

Total value for the state is based on the addition of an approximate valuation of $850,000,000 for property not taxed under the ad valorem basis, namely railroads, express, freight line and telephone companies.

Greatly increased value of platted real estate accounts for $93,018,983 which constitutes 77.91 of the total ad valorem tax property. This increase as applied to the entire real estate classification was cut by the reduction in true and full value of unplatted lands, the reduction for the two-year period amounting to $54,368,976.

During the period 1922-1924 this reduction was much greater—$148,508,108 while between 1920 and 1922 the decrease was $212,801,220. In the meanwhile the platted real estate, increased in 1920-1922, $74,943,035 and in 1922-24, $123,201,528.

This points out the fact that while land in agricultural areas has declined in the true and full values accepted by the commission, platted property, improved and otherwise in cities and towns have steadily increased their values.

The commission's report shows the 1926 values to be:

Unplatted real estate—$2,304,663,108.

Platted real estate—$1,708,232,481.

Unmined iron ore—$519,628,730.

While farm lands have decreased $22,978,006 in assessed value since 1924, increases are shown by the commission in the classifications of structures and improvements as applied to the farms and their machinery equipment.

The 1926 assessed value is $847,208,546 for lands, $118,777,036 for structures and improvements and $2,145,464 for machinery indicating an increase of $4,652,074 over 1924 in the first item and an increase of $201,340 in the machinery. This machinery includes that which is "attached" to a structure and as such is considered a part of the land.

Urban real property assessments increased $41,053,601 during the year, the total assessed value being $682,949,226 compared with $641,895,625 in 1924. The increases are divided between lands, the assessed values of which mounted a total of $2,860,092, structures and improvements which increased $37,423,088 while machinery attached to these improvements added to the assessment rolls increased $769,821.

By further analyzing the assessment of urban real estate it is found that 71 per cent of the entire increase is apportioned between the three largest cities of the state, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth.

Assessed value of personal property dropped from $271,404,793 to $268,557,785 during the last year, the report shows.

At the same time an increase of more than a million dollars was shown in the assessed value of hogs. The 1926 assessed valuation of this class is $54,787,419 compared with $53,654,590, during which the assessed value of hogs in Minnesota moved from $6,558,819 to $7,503,637. Sheep and cattle also increased while horses dropped.

The total animal population of the state is 6,520,345 for 1926, compared with 6,162,697 for 1925. Poultry, listed separately has an assessed value of $2,312,440 for 1926 compared with $2,215,091, the commission has found.

The daily mail at WDAY averages around 300 pieces, and from half a dozen to 50 callers are present at the studio practically every noon, when "Kenneth and The Bug" do their chattering.

A map index of points heard from by letter, phone, or wire, in response to WDAY programs, includes New Mexico, Oregon, New York, and other distant states, with practically every intervening state, several Canadian provinces, and literally thousands of communities in this immediate territory.

Programs from both the North Dakota Agricultural College and Concordia college in Moorhead, are regularly broadcast from WDAY, and the Federal Department of Agriculture's "Farm Flashes" are also a daily feature. Other entertainment is broadcast daily at noon, five p. m., and six p. m.

Wilde Well Aware of Failing of Humanity

Among other amusing stories in his "Memoirs and Adventures," Sir Arthur Conan Doyle relates this characteristic story told him by Oscar Wilde:

"We were discussing the cynical maxim that the good fortune of our friends made us discontented. 'The devil,' said Wilde, 'was once crossing the Libyan desert, and he came upon a spot where a number of small fiends were tormenting a holy hermit. The sainted man easily shook off their evil suggestions. The devil watched their failure and then he stepped forward to give them a lesson. "What you do is too crude," said he. "Permit me for one moment." With that he whispered to the holy man, "Your brother hast just been made bishop of Alexandria." A scowl of malignant jealousy at once clouded the serene face of the hermit. "That," said the devil to his imps, "is the sort of thing which I should recommend."' "

Swordfish range from four to fifteen feet in length, the sword itself being as long as three feet in some cases.

How Radio Helps American Farmer

How the radio is helping the farmer and his family to farm better, live better and sell better is being impressed every day upon Samuel R. Guard, Director of the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation, in letters he receives from farm listeners-in on WLS, the Sears-Roebuck station, Chicago. How WLS, which has become known as the "voice of the farm," is reaching most isolated points is indicated from a message from Kirley, South Dakota, from a farmer 50 miles from the railroad and 15 miles from a telephone. He tells of the aid the market and weather reports have given him in his farm work. Another farmer of Bureau county, Illinois, tells how WLS service enabled him at the last minute to save $75 on a single shipment of hogs.

From far and wide come communications to Mr. Guard of the commercial benefit of the Foundation's station reports and educational talks by agricultural experts. The farm service of WLS starts at 9 o'clock in the morning and is continued throughout the day until 6 p. m. The earliest and very latest information on live stock, crops and weather conditions are broadcast to rural America, and at night, when the farmer is at his fireside, he listens to educational talks on every phase of farming by men who are in a position to give him the information and advice which enable him to help himself.

The practical value of radio to the American farmer cannot be overestimated," said Mr. Guard. "Not only does WLS, the farm station of America, assist the farmer in a practical way, but it helps the farmer's wife and the farmer's children in their Boys' and Girls' club work. The Homemakers' Hour, a daily feature of the station, gives the farm woman just what she wants to know and furnishes entertainment for the entire family."

Health and Home

CARE OF CONVALESCENT IN SUMMER

For those who are just recovering from a serious illness the problem of food is a serious one. The patient though well on the road to recovery is usually weakened by the rigors of disease and the excessive heat is wont to sap his energy. Hence, the foods that are consumed during this period should be considered carefully as to digestibility, food value, ease of assimilation, purity and sterility. These are important in any food but especially so when the consumer is not strong and healthy.

In most cases, the one who is convalescing consumes milk in large quantities. This food contains all of the elements that are essential to the body. If milk is pure and germless it is easily digested and assimilated.

Where the milk supply is uncertain or the quality not of the best, evaporated milk should be employed. It is sterile; it is just pure milk with about sixty per cent of the water removed. Its double richness may be modified if desired, by the addition of water or it may be used just as it is, where rich, creamy dishes are desired.

Many people make the mistake of confusing evaporated milk with condensed milk. They are not at all similar in appearance, composition or taste. They cannot be used for the same purposes; condensed milk is a combination of sugar and milk; evaporated milk has no added sugar, being pure milk of double-rich quality and food value.

Following are recipes of easily prepared dishes and foods that are well suited for the invalid and the convalescent.

Loganberry Cream.

- ⅓ cup evaporated milk
- ⅓ cup water
- ½ cup loganberry juice
- 2 tbsp. lemon juice
- Pinch salt

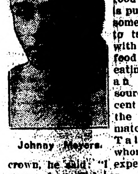
Put all ingredients in a Mason fruit jar and shake thoroughly. Chill and serve in glasses filled ¼ full of ice chips. Raspberry, blackberry, and cherry juice may be used instead of the loganberry.

Iced Cocoa.

- 3 tsp. cocoa
- 3 tsp. sugar
- ¼ cup water
- Pinch salt
- ½ cup evaporated milk diluted with
- ½ cup water
- ⅛ tsp. vanilla

Mix cocoa and sugar thoroughly and add the ¼ cup water and boil over a low flame for 15 minutes. Scald the diluted milk and add cocoa syrup and salt. Continue cooking for 15 minutes in double boiler. Add vanilla. Chill and serve with chipped ice. Top with whipped cream.

Champion Wrestler Tells What to Eat



Johnny Meyers.

Johnny Meyers, middleweight wrestling champion of the world, is strongly in favor of the use of scientifically prepared foods. He prefers to know that the food he is eating is pure and wholesome rather than to take a chance with any kind of food poisoning by eating food from an unknown source. In a recent interview on the eve of his match with Lou Talaber, from whom he won his crown, he said: "I expect to win the crown from Talaber. He is a fine wrestler and uses more science than any man of the mat today. However, I feel sure that my superior physical condition will prevail and that I will emerge victorious and the champion of my division. Diet is a very important part of my program in training for a match. The system that I use is really very simple, involving only good judgment and caution in the selection of food. I prefer to eat scientifically prepared foods whenever possible and I never eat anything to which is attached the slightest doubt of its purity. I eat a great deal of canned foods because I am sure that they are pure and will have no ill effects on my digestive system. Take just as an example of what food can do for the body—milk. It is the greatest of body builders and a very important part of any man's diet. But it sometimes impure or contaminated and may be the source of illness if used. Because of this fact, I use evaporated milk entirely and find it very satisfactory. I know that it is pure and that I will not suffer from its use. I know that it is a great body builder because the concentration of it gives it such food value. I know that it is easily digested, more so than market milk, in fact, because I drink it before going to bed and feel no effects of it in the morning. This is usually hard to do with ordinary market milk. This plan, in substance, is the same one that I use regarding other foods. If there is any chance or suspicion of impurity or low food value, I use something else.

"And if a man is so situated that it is impossible for him to get the proper amount of exercise, he must be doubly cautious not to partake of any but the purest food. On the whole, if a man eats with wisdom and observes the fundamental rules for good health, there is no reason why he should ever have a sick or uncomfortable day."

How Butter Fat in Milk Is Broken Up

Fat Globules in Raw Milk.

Do you know what the word homogenization means?

Ninety-eight out of 100 housewives to whom the question recently was put admitted they couldn't answer. Can you?

But here it is explained by Miss Meta H. Given, food authority doing research work at the University of Chicago.

"Homogenization," says Miss Given, "is the name of the process which breaks up butter fat in evaporated milk into tiny particles so they blend evenly with the solids. Homogenization causes the butter fat globules to adhere to the albumin and the casein of the milk. In the process, milk is forced through countless numbers of openings at a pressure of around 3,500 pounds.

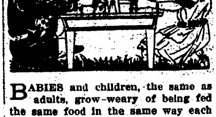
"In addition to preventing a cream and skim milk line, this breaking up of fat contributes to smoothness and perfect blending of foods such as cream sauces, soups, ice cream and in baked products.

"It also has a digestive advantage for those who have difficulty in assimilating milk. Many pediatricians recommend evaporated milk as a baby food, although, like other substitutes for the natural supply, it should not be considered as a food complete in itself. Addition of orange or tomato juice, barley water or lime water are important in providing adequate diet for the infant.

Globules After Homogenization.

"All authorities recognize that normal mother's milk is the best food for infants, but this natural milk is frequently inadequate in quality and quantity. Scientists say cow's milk is the best substitute. But cow's milk must be modified and supplemented with other foods. The fat in mother's milk is in homogeneous suspension and being flocculent forms small curds in the stomach, but the fat in cow's milk is in relatively large globules, forms large tough curds in the stomach and is much harder to digest. In evaporated milk the fat is broken up by homogenization and the curds softened until in size and digestibility they resemble natural infant food."

Nourishing Drink for Children



BABIES and children, the same as adults, grow weary of being fed the same food in the same way each day. It is true that most children take naturally to milk, but that does not mean that they must be fed it ad nauseam. On the contrary, that is the very thing to be avoided.

Pediatricians advise consumption by children of a quart of milk a day in one form or another. This does not mean skim milk, but whole milk, for the skimmed product is lacking both in butter fat and the essential food element known as vitamin A, which is found in butter fat. Many mothers do not appreciate that removal of cream from the top of a bottle of milk results in skim milk.

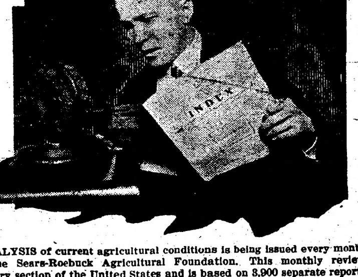
In evaporated milk, a product recommended by many leading doctors for the use of infants and children and which is simply pure cow's milk sterilized in cans and with sixty per cent of the water removed, there is no cream line. The milk in the top of a can is the same as it is in the bottom of the container. This results from a process called homogenization, in which the fat globules in the milk are broken up into such microscopic bits that they remain in homogeneous suspension. Every drop of homogenized milk has a buttery taste because it contains butter fat. For this reason, in evaporated milk, there is none of the flat taste one finds in drinking from the bottom of a bottle of market milk.

In order to avoid feeding the baby or child plain milk three or four times a day, many authorities recommend the use of a mixture of fruit juice and milk, a highly palatable and refreshing drink.

Following is a recipe worked out by experts for an orange-milk drink:

Mix in a fruit jar ⅞ of a cupful of orange juice, ¼ of a cupful of evaporated milk, three teaspoonfuls of sugar, ⅛ teaspoonful of lemon juice and a few grains of salt. Shake well before serving.

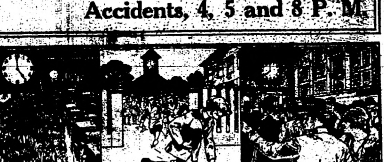
Covers Nation's Farms by Air



AN ANALYSIS of current agricultural conditions is being issued every month by the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. This monthly review covers every section of the United States and is based on 3,900 separate reports furnished by the Foundation's field observers, who are all practical, thinking farmers. Working together for farm betterment, these observers reflect in a most practical way a cross section of the farmer's mind. Each of the observers has been selected because of his ability to observe the application of economic principles to current agricultural problems. The status of agriculture each month is shown by the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation Index.

As soon as issued the results of this agricultural review are broadcast over WLS, the Foundation's station, Chicago, by Perry V. Ewing, who is in charge of the work of the Foundation. Mr. Ewing has had years of experience in agricultural effort. For six years he conducted live stock investigations in Kansas, Georgia and Texas. He also is author of a dozen state and federal bulletins and scientific reports. He is a member of Sigma Xi, the highest honorary scientific fraternity.

Zero Hours of Automobile Accidents, 4, 5 and 8 P. M.



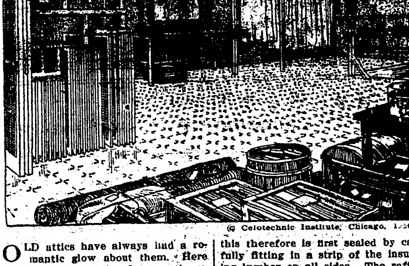
5:00 P. M 4:00 P. M. 8:00 P. M.

ONE thousand and thirty of Chicago's 11,785 auto accidents last year, according to the Stewart-Warner Safety Council for the prevention of automobile accidents, occurred between five and six o'clock, just when congestion is at its worst in the home-going rush. Only 47 of these 1,030 accidents were fatal.

Four o'clock is the children's zero hour. Thirty-three of the 182 children killed by autos in Chicago last year came to grief at four o'clock, playing in the streets after school.

Seven to nine is the dangerous time for adult auto fatalities, according to Chicago's 1924 record. Eighty-six of 353 such deaths occurred around the theater-going hours.

Insulated Attic Wife's New Storeroom



(©, Celotechnic Institute, Chicago, 1926.)

OLD attics have always had a romantic glow about them. Here old wives are supposed to sentimentalize over time-yellowed wedding gloves and scuffed baby shoes. Here young girls on rainy days bedeck themselves in the crinolines and bodices of by-gone ages. And here—in fiction, at least—the long lost will is brought to light and the family fortunes revived in the nick of time.

But as a matter of actual fact, most attics are places of unbelievable discomfort and disorder. For one romantic attic it is safe to say there are a hundred which serve only as catch-alls for dirt and disused articles which would be better thrown away outright.

Nevertheless, an attic is the logical place to store necessary articles, and with a little effort it may be made into an ideal storage room.

The first consideration is to keep the attic at a moderate temperature the year round. Extreme cold in winter will cause furniture to check all over; extreme heat will make things dry out and fall to pieces; damp will bring mildew and decay. Insulating the attic will avoid all these dangers and at the same time make the rooms below much more comfortable and effect a marked saving of fuel bills. Sixty per cent of all the heat in a house, engineers say, escapes through the roof. A large amount of this can be conserved by proper insulation.

A material which both insulates and serves as an interior finish is the cane fiber insulating lumber, celotex which comes in large boards ready to be nailed directly under the rafters. Where the joists meet the rafters is the [illegible] of greatest heat leakage and this therefore is first sealed by carefully fitting in a strip of the insulating lumber on all sides. The rafters are next sealed, also side walls.

A layer of the insulating lumber put on the floor will afford additional insulation, allowing even less heat to filter up from below and so effect a corresponding saving in fuel bills. This will keep the attic somewhat cooler but unless it is to be used also as a workshop this does not matter.

Where there is no flooring already in place, the celotex is nailed to the floor joists and covered with a wood flooring; where there is already a subflooring, the insulating lumber may be applied over it and linoleum cemented on top of that.

The well-equipped storage room should have plenty of shelves and cupboards. A good supply of paper, string and marking tags should always be on hand. A working shelf, which may be hinged and hooked up to the ceiling when not in use, is a great help in sorting things or folding clothes.

With a little ingenuity, racks may be made to hold the screen and storm windows, like the ones used for extra table leaves. This prevents their being injured and simplifies getting out any particular one.

If electric light is in the house, an extension cord may be run up to the attic. It should be long enough to reach any part of the room, and hooks should be screwed in at various places ready to hang it on. If it is necessary to carry a lamp up to the attic, a few little shelves should be nailed up in different places where it can be placed without danger of knocking over.

HOW TO SAVE MONEY WHEN SHOPPING

By MRS. HARLAND H. ALLEN

(©, 1922, Harland H. Allen.)

HOW TO BUY BLANKETS

It takes some care and thought to buy blankets, that is, if one is particular about getting value received for her money. It is not enough that the design be pretty; and it is a bad plan to buy cheap ones, as good blankets wear so much longer and are more satisfactory in every way.

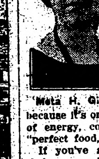
Of course you know that the finest 100 per cent wool blankets are very expensive. Salesmen say that probably three out of every four of the medium-priced blankets now on the market are "union blankets," that is, they are made up with a cotton warp and a wool weft or filling. These union blankets give excellent service, but, of course, are not so warm or so light as an all-wool blanket. As the proportion of cotton increases, the price is, or should be, lowered, because the quality of the blanket is changed. Cotton blankets are heavy, soil easily, and give little warmth.

It is well to remember that the best blankets have a surface resembling a rather thick bed of wool, and are light as well as warm. It is quite easy to be deceived by what we think is a thick woolly nap on a blanket, though. Some blankets are made entirely of cotton, and this long nap put on by machinery. If the tufting can be too easily scratched off with the fingernail it is very likely a surface nap.

You can soon learn to tell when there is a large percentage of cotton in a blanket. In the first place it will be heavier, because cotton has more specific gravity than wool. A very noticeable thing about a blanket that has too much cotton yarn is that the characteristic wiry, elastic feel of wool gives place to the softer and more yielding quality of cotton. By doubling over a fold of the blanket and studying the edge you can recognize a union blanket, as the cotton will stand out in a straight line, while wool fibers would be crinkly and curly instead of straight like the cotton. The cotton warp may also be detected at the edge of the blanket.

Most women like their blankets to be decorative as well as practical. The best sellers seem to be plaid designs in pink, blue, or yellow combined with white, to fit in with the color scheme of the bedroom. Usually blankets come double, but for convenience, many housewives cut them apart and bind the edges.

Fudge Making Finds Favor With Co-Eds



Meta H. Given.

Fudge may be classed with pie as a typical American dish. It has a place in every young man's heart and every girl's category of accomplishments. Co-eds swear by fudge and "fudge shines" in sorority parlors are the very latest wrinkle in collegiate circles.

There's a big wallop in a platter of fudge, the co-eds explain, because it's one of the greatest sources of energy, containing both milk, the "perfect food," and sugar.

If you've any doubt of the place fudge occupies in the young male heart, try these recipes on him and hear his own answer. Each of the appended dishes was prepared by Miss Meta Given, doing research work in the home economics department of the University of Chicago, and they are the result of much experimentation.

Chocolate Fudge.

- 2 cups sugar
- ⅔ cup evaporated milk
- ⅓ cup water
- 1 tbsp. corn sirup
- 2 squares chocolate
- Few grains of salt
- 1 tbsp. butter
- ½ tsp. vanilla

Shave the chocolate so that it will melt more easily. Add the sugar, salt, milk, water and corn sirup. Cook, stirring until chocolate and sugar are melted, and then only occasionally to prevent burning, until the soft ball stage is reached, or a temperature of 234 degrees Fahrenheit. Remove from fire and add the butter. Cool until almost lukewarm, 110 degrees, add flavoring and beat vigorously until when a little is dropped from the spoon it will hold its shape. Pour into oiled tins and mark in squares.

Cocoanut Candy.

- 1½ cup sugar
- ¼ cup evaporated milk
- ¼ cup water
- 1 tsp. butter
- 1-3 cup shredded cocoanut
- ½ tsp. vanilla

Put butter into granite saucepan; when melted, add sugar, milk and water, and stir until sugar is dissolved. Heat to boiling, and cook to the soft ball stage. Remove from fire, add cocoanut and vanilla, cool to 110 degrees Fahrenheit and beat until creamy and mixture begins to sugar slightly around edge of pan. Pour into buttered pan and when cool mark in squares.

Penoche.

- 2 cups brown or maple sugar
- ⅔ cup evaporated milk
- ⅔ cup water
- 1 tbsp. butter
- 1 tsp. vanilla
- 2 cups chopped nuts

Boil sugar, milk and water to the soft ball stage. Remove from the fire; add butter, flavoring and nuts. Cool to 110 degrees Fahrenheit, then beat until creamy and thickened; pour into a greased tin and when firm cut.

Caloric Requirements of the Child

DIETITIANS declare that the average boy or girl of four years should receive about forty calories a pound of body weight per day. The average weight of a child of four years is forty pounds. Therefore the total caloric requirement would be approximately 1,600 calories. Calory is merely the name for a certain measure of heat derived from the burning of food.

Necessarily, the caloric requirement of the child is dependent on his temperament, since a child who plays hard and long requires more nourishment than one who leads a quieter life. Rate of growth also has a bearing on caloric requirements. The child who is growing rapidly should be given more food to meet his caloric needs than the boy or girl whose growth is normal.

Mothers know the daily diet should consist of the essential foodstuffs, protein, carbohyrates, fats, minerals and water. The important thing for her is to learn the foods that contain these essentials in a balanced diet. Below is a well-balanced menu for any child six years old compiled by an authority on home economics.

ONE DAY'S MENU FOR SIX-YEAR-OLD CHILD.

6 stewed prunes	120 calories

1 baked apple (1 tbsp. sugar, ½ tbsp. butter)	200 calories
1 glass milk	160 calories
1 slice bread buttered with ½ tbsp. butter	100 calories
	685 calories
Afternoon Luncheon at School.
1 orange	100 calories
Dinner.
1 small piece broiled steak (2¼ x 2½ x ½)	75 calories

2-3 cupful lima bean soup made with evaporated milk	75 calories
1 glass milk, orange drink	160 calories
	510 calories
Total	1,840 calories

Children often become wearied of drinking plain milk. Mixing their milk with fruit juices is a welcome change. Following is the recipe for a refreshing milk drink: Mix ⅞ cupful orange juice, ¼ cupful evaporated milk, three teaspoonfuls of sugar, ⅛ teaspoonful of lemon juice and a few grains of salt. Shake well in a fruit jar before serving.

TO KNOW IF IT IS "ALL WOOL"

When you go to buy woolen material, there are many pitfalls you have to learn to avoid. It is quite true that most of us cannot afford to buy our cloth made up of all new wool, but at least we want to be able to tell when a cloth is made up of cotton and wool mixed, or all new wool.

The peculiar felting quality of wool makes it possible to conceal a large amount of cotton in its fibers. Now this may not always be any great disadvantage, and it is certainly more desirable to buy a good, firm piece of part-wool dress goods, when the price is right, than a cheap, inferior grade, even if it is "all wool." A cardinal point every shopper needs to fix in her mind is that "all wool" is not necessarily good wool.

Perhaps the greatest objection to a mixture of wool and cotton is the uneven shrinkage of the two, which makes it hard to keep the garment well-pressed and in shape. Often it is the presence of cotton that causes a wool skirt to be baggy at the knees and to sag at the back and sides, wherever there are long seams.

Then, too, a large percentage of cotton is likely to give trouble with the dyes. This would not apply to white woolens, of course, but in colored goods, especially those of very dark colors, the cotton may not hold the dye well. As you know, all dark colors tend to be fugitive on cotton.

It is perfectly possible to determine to your own satisfaction whether there is cotton in a wool sample. Pull out some of the threads and burn them. A cotton thread burns much more quickly than a wool one, and with more flame; wool chars, leaves a crisp ash, and smells like burnt feathers. So the one that has the worst smell contains the most wool!

The most accurate tests, of course, are the chemical ones, and the housewife does not have equipment for trying these. But there is one, and the very best one at that, which any one can try. Take a little caustic soda or potash, and dissolve in a pint of water. Boil your sample of cloth in this solution. It will dissolve any wool, but leave the cotton unchanged. If your sample is all wool it will be entirely dissolved!

A very good showing considering the wet and unfavorable season. Arno Steinhauer tops the list again this year, also high man for 1925. Arno Steinhauer does'nt claim to have the best cows in the community, yet he has done remarkably well when you realize he started in with mostly all red ones as he calls them. He has to day mostly all holstiens, grades and one or more purebreds if I recall correctly.

J. P. Augustine holds second place. He no doubt is the owner of some of the best cows in our community. The record his cows made for month of December 1926 is an outstanding without a doubt. Very few herds in the state can show as high a production. Our old standby C. A. Davis occupies third place for the year. He has always been one of our large patrons, in fact I believe he holds the title of being the biggest producer in a five year period. He is further credited as the patron that delivered the most Land O' Lakes cream to our creamery for 1926.

F. D. Voth ranks fourth on the list, he moved up one peg since last year. Voth, as far as I have been able to ascertain, gets the largest net return per cow above cost of feed. This is what every dairyman should strive for and without a question is the big thing of today. Whether you believe in a testing association or not it is never going to do you any good until you get to be a member of one that is functioning every day in the year, when you do that you will be in a position to say something about the amount each and every cow has brought you for the year, in fact, that is the time you will know something about your own business. This hit and miss system is not going to continue in any line much longer so why not get in line for a testing association this spring.

If only time permitted, as well as space in our local paper I would say every patron delivering cream to their cooperative creamery should be praised. Not that we shouldn't expect them to do so but when competition is as keen & undermining as it is by our centralizers of today, trying at all times to break up our cooperative creameries, I say our patrons as a whole must be given credit for their loyal support and let us not falter in doing as well in the year 1927.

Treat Seed, Prevent Grain Crop Wastes

What Dr. E. C. Stackman of University Farm declares a tragic waste, because it can be so easily prevented, is the loss caused by the smuts of wheat, barley, oats, and rye. All of us ought to know by this time that the covered smut or bunt of wheat can be prevented by treating the seed with copper carbonate dust, or formaldehyde. The dust treatment has several outstanding advantages. The formaldehyde treatment should be used for oats and barley. The university men say that most of the patent fungicides on the market do not prevent smut any better than copper carbonate dust or formaldehyde.

Cars Must Stop At Ry. Crossings

New Law Provides a Full Stop at "Stop" Crossings And a Slow Down at All Others.

In accordance with the requirements of a law passed in the 1925 session of the legislature, certain railroad crossings have been designated "stop" crossings, and have been plainly marked. All automobiles are required to come to a full stop when approaching such crossings. The law also provides that all vehicles approaching any crossing shall cut down speed to such a rate that it can be stopped before reaching the nearest rail of the railroad track.

Vehicles carrying school children, explosives, or inflammable liquids, or any car towing another, must come to a full stop before crossing railroad tracks anywhere.

The object of this law is to protect the occupants of cars as well as the traveling public in general, and the state Railroad and Warehouse Commission asks the co-operation of all motorists in observance and enforcement of its provisions.

Growing Mining Industry

The mining industry of Alaska is going ahead rapidly and will increase in leaps and bounds when the facilities for getting the mined material out of the country are increased, as they undoubtedly will be in the near future, which will result in cutting the cost of transportation. Last year the total value of the production was $18,220,692, while that of the previous year was $17,457,333.

Always Thus

A fussy diner called the waiter and said, "I want a nice lamb chop. Give my compliments to the chef and ask him to do his best for me. Tell him to put a little piece of fat on the top when he grills it, so that it will melt and make it juicy. I don't want the chop underdone—nor do I want it burnt up—just nicely done, with plenty of gravy. Tell the chef exactly what I require, won't you?"

"Yes, sir certainly," replied the waiter.

Then he shouted down the speaking tube: "One chop, Joe!"—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

Might Have Hit Kaiser

Had Annie Oakley been a poor markswoman she might have ended the career of the former kaiser of Germany while he was still a crown prince. She was in Berlin with Buffalo Bill's show and she skipped a matinee to accept the crown prince's invitation to go to the palace gardens and shoot a cigarette from his mouth. Standing fifty yards from Annie, the prince lighted a cigarette and took two puffs, then signaled her to blaze away. She lifted her rifle to her shoulder, drew a perfect bead and fired. The bullet flicked the ashes from the end of the cigarette, leaving a four-inch stub sticking in his mouth.

Such a Candid Girl

The neatest rap at the emancipated young women of today, who pride themselves upon their freedom in talking about sex, is a brief passage in a little skit just published in London.

"Isn't Lulu a dear?" asks one character. "She's so candid one can talk to her about anything."

"In fact," another replies, "you can't talk to her about anything else."

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast.

PROLOGUE—Continued

"You can always be relied on, Anne, to do the tactful thing. Walberg was set on it. Stokes can't be beaten in that part, and he's at liberty. But I wasn't going to take any chances of her refusing, and if Stokes was in the company I was afraid she might."

"I don't know whether she'd have gone that far, but it would have spoiled everything for her and for the rest of us, too. It's all plain sailing now except for one thing"—she stopped and then in answer to his questioning look—"about the police. If they have her under surveillance, as people say, what'll they do about it up there?"

The big man shrugged:

"Camp in the village on the mainland—they certainly can't come on the island. We've special instructions about it—no one but the company to be allowed there till the performance. Did she speak to you about that?"

"No, she hardly ever alludes to the subject. But they would keep a watch on her, wouldn't they?"

He nodded, frowning a little at a complication new in his experience:

"I should think so—a woman in her position. Men under sentence of death have been unable to keep away from the girl they were in love with. And then she may know where he is, be in communication with him."

"Oh, I don't think that," Anne breathed in alarm. "She'd never take such a risk."

A slight grating noise came from the hall. Anne held up a quick cautioning hand.

"Take care," she murmured. "Here's Joe."

Joe came in, his Panama hat low on his brow. He gave no sign of greeting till he saw Bassett, then he emitted an abrupt "Hello" and snatched off his hat:

"Little Anne's got a caller. Howdy, Bassett! How's things?"

He was like Anne, the same delicate features, the same long eyebrows and the same trick of raising them till they curved high on his forehead. But his face had an elfish, almost malign quality lacking in hers, and the brown eyes, brilliant and hard, were set too close to his nose.

He launched forth with a suggestion of pouncing eagerness on the "Twelfth Night" performance. He had heard this and that, and Anne had told him the other. His interest surprised Anne, he hadn't shown much to her; only a few laconic questions. And she was wondering what was in his mind, as she so often wondered when Joe held the floor, when a question enlightened her:

"Have you got anybody to play Sebastian yet?"

"No. I wanted that boy who played with Sybil on the southern tour last year, but he's in England. He gave a first-rate performance and he surely did look like her."

"That was a lucky chance. You'll search the whole profession before you get anyone that looks like Sybil's twin brother. Why, Mrs. Gawtrey, the English actress, when she was over here, had a boy to play Sebastian who looked as much like her—well, not as much as I look like Sybil."

Bassett had seen his object as Anne had and was considering. He had been looking forward to the week at Gull island with Anne, it loomed in his imagination as a festival. There would be a pleasant, companionable group of people, friendly, working well together. But Joe among them—

The boy, looking down at his feet, said slowly:

"What's the matter with letting me do it?"

"Nothing's the matter. I've no doubt you could, but you and she have about as much resemblance as chalk and cheese."

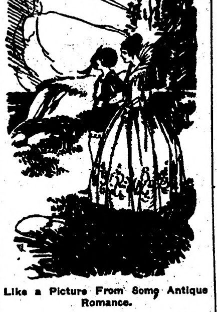
Joe wheeled and gathering his coat neatly about his waist walked across the room with a mincing imitation of Sybil's gait. It was so well done that Bassett could not contain his laughter. Encouraged, the boy assumed a combative attitude, his face aflame with startled anger, and striking out, at imaginary opponents, shouted: "'Why, there's for thee, and there and there and there. Are all the people mad?'" Then as suddenly melted to a lover's tone and looking ardently at Anne said: "'If it be thus to dream then let me sleep.'"

"Oh, he could play it," she exclaimed, and Bassett weakened before pleading in her eyes.

He understood how to manage Joe, he could keep him in order. The boy was afraid of him anyway, and by this time knew that his future lay pretty well in Bassett's hands. If there was anything Anne wanted that was within his gift there could be no question about its being hers.

She was very sweet, murmuring her thanks as she went with him to the door and assurances that Joe would acquit himself well. Bassett hardly heard what she said, looking into her dark eyes, feeling the soft farewell pressure of her hand.

Joe had left the sitting room when she went back there and she supposed he had gone to bed. But presently he came in, his hat on again and said he was going out. She was surprised, it was past eleven, but he swung about looking for his cane, saying it was too hot to sleep. She tried to detain him with remarks about the new work. He answered shortly as was his wont with her, treating it as a small matter, nothing to get excited about—also a familiar pose. But she noticed under his nonchalance a repressed satisfaction, the glow of an inner elation in his eyes.



Like a Picture From Some Antique Romance.

CHAPTER I

The performance was over and the audience was dispersing. Some of them had gone into the house, taken the chance to have a look at it—when the Driscolls were "in residence" you couldn't so much as put your foot on the rocks round the shore. Others lingered, having a farewell word with the actors, congratulating them—it was the right thing to do and they deserved it. The committee was very affable, shaking hands with Mr. Bassett the director and Miss Saunders, the star, who, in her page's dress with the paint still on her face, looked tired, poor girl, but was so sweet and unassuming.

The fleet of boats, rocking gently on the narrow channel that separated Gull island from the mainland, took on their freight and darted off. They started in groups, then broke apart. The launches skimmed, light-winged, the white flurry of their wakes like threads that stretched back to the island.

Part of the flotilla carried the Hayworth villagers—all-year residents of the little town on the mainland. Some of the more solid citizens were in the launch that old Gabriel Harvey owned, which had been used by the actors in their week's stay. Hayworth had gathered a great deal of information about these spectacular visitors, some from Gabriel and some from Sara Pinkney who was Mr. Driscoll's housekeeper. Every day she came over to Hayworth for supplies and had to appease the local curiosity, which she did grudgingly, feeling her power.

Now at last the Hayworth people had had a first-hand view of the actors—the whole company, dressed up and performing—and they fitted Sara Pinkney's description to them. Olivia, that was Miss Tracy, the one she said was so refined and pleasant spoken. And the Duke was Alexander Stokes. And the woman who stood round and "tended on" Olivia was his wife. Sara hadn't said much about her. Well, she wasn't of much importance anyhow or she'd have had more acting to do. But that boy who was Viola's twin, he was Miss Tracy's brother, and Sara had said he and Miss Saunders didn't get on well, she could see it though they didn't say much. And here piped up the butcher's wife who was more interested in the play than in personalities:

"I don't see how Olivia took him for the page she was in love with. He didn't look like Viola in the face. She was real pretty, but he'd a queer sly mug on him, that boy."

"I guess she was meant to be blinded by love. And him dressed the same, hair and all, might lead her astray."

"I don't see how you could have 'em look just alike unless they'd get an actress who had a real twin brother, and maybe you'd go the whole country over and not find that."

"He ain't like her no way," growled old Gabriel from the wheel, "I seen 'em both when they wasn't acting and he's an ugly pup, that one."

Then the boat grating on the Hayworth wharf, Gabriel urged them off. He hadn't got through yet, got to go back for part of the company who were calculating to get the main line at Spencer, and after that back again for the Tracy boy.

The swaying throng of boats emptied their cargoes and the thick-pressed crowd, moving to the end of the wharf, separated into streams and groups. Farewells, last commending comments, rose on the limpid sea-scented air. The waiting line of motors absorbed the summer visitors, wheeled off and purred away past the white cottages under the New England elms. The matrons sank gratefully upon the yielding cushions, rolling by the dusty buggies, the battered autos, the lines of bicycle riders, into the quiet serene country where the shadows were lying long and clear. Yes, it had been a great success; from first to last there hadn't been a hitch.

There was one outsider left on the island, Wally Shine, the photographer sent by the Universal syndicate to take pictures of what was a "notable society event" in a place of which the public had heard much and seen nothing. But, unlike the other outsiders, his impressions, extending over a longer period, had not been so agreeable. He had seen the actors at close range, in their habits as they lived, lunched with them, watched the last rehearsal, taken a lot of pictures of Miss Saunders in the house and garden. And he had sensed an electric disturbance in the atmosphere, and come upon evidences of internal discord.

That was at the last rehearsal, when the poetic Viola had lost her temper like an ordinary woman and jumped on the Tracy boy—something about the place he stood in—nothing, as far as Shine could see, to get mad about. And the boy had answered in kind, like the spitting of an angry cat. An ugly scene that the director had to stop.

Then the man Stokes who played the Duke, a handsome, romantic looking chap—something was the matter with him. He had a haunted sort of look, as if his mind was disturbed, especially when he'd turn his eyes on Miss Saunders. His wife—the woman they called Flora—was on to him. Shine saw her watching him, sidelong from under her eyelids, the way you watch a person when you don't want them to see it.

The photographer was sensitive to emotional stress and he felt it here—below the surface—and was moved to curiosity.

The photographs were finished and the group broke up. Miss Saunders and Miss Tracy linked arms and moved off toward the headlands. Receding in the amber light they were like a picture from some antique romance—the noble lady and her page. One in narrow casings of crimson brocade, the other in short swinging kilt and braided jacket of more sober gray. Shine, fascinated, watched them pacing slowly over the burnished grass. He turned to go and saw that Stokes was watching them, too, intent like a hungry dog, the hand that held a stalk of feathered grass against his lips, trembling.

Pulitzer Would Have Had Royal Birds Shot

Fitzroy Gardner, in his book, "More Reminiscences of an Old Bohemian," tells this story about Joseph Pulitzer: "On one occasion, having to stay one night in London, and fearing that his rest would be disturbed by street traffic, he instructed his London representative to obtain at any cost the use of some private house where no traffic could be heard. One of the mansions in Kensington palace gardens was rented for a week for the purpose of a night's occupation. Pulitzer was quite satisfied with the arrangement until, in the early hours of the morning, he was awakened by the piercing shrieks, not many yards away, of peacocks from Kensington palace. He rang for his valet, gave him a revolver—Pulitzer generally had one—and told him to go out and shoot the birds. The valet, not daring to disobey his master, did some desultory firing; the neighborhood was alarmed; police rushed to the spot, and Pulitzer was seriously inconvenienced by the enforced temporary absence of his servant."

Everybody Excited

Everybody seems excited these days; people write letters in italics; voices sweet and low have become obsolete; nothing any longer is either good or bad, everything is damn good or damn bad. And the less vocabulary people have to use, the more they use it.—William Lyon Phelps in Scribner's.

Help Kidneys By Drinking More Water

Take Salts to Flush Kidneys and Help Neutralize Irritating Acids

Kidney and bladder irritations often result from acidity, says a noted authority. The kidneys help filter this acid from the blood and pass it on to the bladder, where it may remain to irritate and inflame, causing a burning, scalding sensation, or setting up an irritation at the neck of the bladder, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night. The sufferer is in constant dread; the water passes sometimes with a scalding sensation and is very profuse; again, there is difficulty in voiding it.

Bladder weakness, most folks call it because they can't control urination. While it is extremely annoying and sometimes very painful, this is often one of the most simple ailments to overcome. Begin drinking lots of soft water, also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from your pharmacist and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast. Continue this for two or three days. This will help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer are a source of irritation to the bladder and urinary organs, which then act normal again.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, and is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and is used by thousands of folks who are subject to urinary disorders caused by acid irritation. Jad Salts causes no bad effects whatever.

Here you have a pleasant, effervescent lithia-water drink which may quickly relieve your bladder irritation.

It is such a highly concentrated preparation that two ounces lasts a long time and furthermore if this wonderful discovery does not give you complete satisfaction you can have your money refunded.

Special note: People who want to reduce swollen or varicose veins should get a bottle of Emerald Oil at once. Applied night and morning as directed they will quickly notice an improvement which will continue until the veins and bunches are reduced to normal.

Tulipland

ALTHOUGH nature gave to Bellingham, Wash., a location—overlooking Puget sound and the San Juan archipelago on the one hand and adjacent to the celebrated Mount Baker scenic section on the other—that would make most any city's head swim with pride, the particular attractions which Bellingham never gets done boasting about are its tulips and its sunsets. In fact, Bellinghamians prefer to have their city referred to as "The City of Tulips and Beautiful Sunsets." Admittedly, both are extraordinarily beautiful.

As a matter of fact, Bellingham claims to be the tulip center of America. It grows something like two million bulbs annually, most of which are of that gorgeous cup-like flower, the tulip, the others hyacinths and narcissus. The government's tulip farm is located here because the climatic and rainfall conditions making for the successful growing of this popular flower are quite similar to those which exist in Holland.

Thus it has come to pass that each year, by virtue of the complete co-operation of man and nature, one can look out upon thousands and thousands of tulips and hyacinths and narcissus in full bloom, a scene of distinctly unusual floral brilliance, a riot of color, a sort of dream picture the like of which 'tis said cannot be witnessed elsewhere in America, which gives to the beholder a sure-enough touch of what might be termed tulipmania. 'Tis then, generally the first week in May, that Bellingham pulls off her spectacular stunt—the Annual Tulip Festival and Blossom show—which draws lovers of the beautiful in flowers from states both far and near.

The Philadelphia-Camden Bridge

ALTHOUGH around 5,000,000 persons have been annually ferried across the Delaware river between Philadelphia and Camden in recent years and countless additional thousands have passed over it on trains, it is nevertheless an astounding fact that not until 1926 was it possible for foot, street car or automobile traffic to make the trip between these two great traffic-originating points via bridge.

In July, 1926, President Coolidge dedicated the great new suspension bridge which now spans this busy and useful river at this point. It is a gigantic structure. The main span is a third of a mile long—the longest of the kind in the world, it is claimed, while the entire structure is one and three-quarter miles in length. Its broad deck is one hundred and twenty-five feet wide and accommodates six lines of vehicles and four lines of street cars, in addition to two footwalks for pedestrians.

The total cost, which was divided between the states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey and the city of Philadelphia, was about $37,000,000.

The far-reaching significance of this great connecting link registers when one scans a road map. It has an interstate as well as a national relationship. The great coastal highway system running down from Maine strings into Camden. The great coastal highway system running north from Florida goes into Philadelphia. There was no public bridge across this American Clyde between Philadelphia and the sea—100 miles to the southward. Philadelphia-Camden was the strategic and focal point. These two great highways, made one by this bridge, connect the Atlantic states with all the other states in the Union.

Big Spring

DOWN in the Ozark mountains in southeastern Missouri a short distance from the town of Van Buren, there is a fenced-in area comprising some five thousand acres of virgin forest, lofty hills and bald, bold cliffs. This is Big Spring state park—a reservation which has been set aside for the protection and preservation of Big Spring.

Big Spring boils up from no-one knows where at the base of a tall, rugged, wooded cliff which is flanked by a beautiful and peaceful valley. Roaring out from beneath this cliff with considerable fuss and noise, as if released from great pressure, the water is caught in a great churning pool, perhaps a hundred feet, only to be swallowed up and lost in the Current river which meanders off through the woods in a leisurely sort of manner and which both old and young residents declare cannot be surpassed by any stream in Missouri as a game fish stream.

Big Spring is not only the largest and most wonderful in the "Show Me" state, but is said to be the second largest in these United States. The state geologist reports its average flow as 240,000,000 gallons per day, which is 10,000,000 gallons an hour, and declares that it has been known to flow considerably more than twice that much or 543,000,000 gallons in 24 hours.

BOY OF 16 SLAYS FOR HIS MOTHER

She Admits Asking Him to Kill Her Assailant.

Detroit, Mich.—Anthony Enyedi, Jr., sixteen, confessed to the Highland Park police that it was he who killed George Fanchall, forty-three.

Fanchall, a contractor, was shot as he sat chatting with a friend in the living room of his home at 52 Kendall avenue, Highland Park. The assassin fired both barrels of a shotgun through the living-room window.

The Enyedi boy said that he killed Fanchall at the request of his mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Enyedi, after she had accused the carpenter of forcing attentions on her by threatening her with a pistol.

"I told my husband how he had threatened me with a revolver," Mrs. Enyedi said. "My husband was angry with me.

"Finally I told my boy, Anthony, 'You will have to kill him or I'll go crazy and kill him myself.' I told Anthony that Fanchall had been bothering me for nearly a year."

"I could see that dad was mad at mother," Anthony related. "I thought she would go crazy, so I got the old shotgun we have and sawed off the end of the barrel.

"I took mother to a movie show, and when we came out we drove over to the man's house.

"I took the gun and went to a window and waited there half an hour. Mother stayed in the car. I lost my nerve and went back to the automobile and told her I couldn't do it. She told me I had to. She said it would be the last favor she ever would ask me to do for her. She said that if I didn't shoot Fanchall she would take the gun away from me and do it herself.

"I went back and shot him."

Carries Bullet in Brain Four Years; Dies

Philadelphia.—The victim of a bandit holdup who was wounded in Canada in 1922 and who died in this city January 8 last, was found to have carried a bullet in his brain for almost four years, it was revealed at an inquest before Coroner Schwarz. The dead man is Joseph Bernstein, twenty-seven years old.

According to an investigation made by Deputy Coroner Melett, following the death of Bernstein in the University hospital, Bernstein was seized with an illness at his home the evening of New Year's day. At the hospital his complaint was diagnosed as an abscess of the brain, and while physicians made valiant efforts to save his life he died a week later.

An autopsy revealed that a bullet had lodged at the base of the brain and caused the abscess. Members of Bernstein's family told of the shooting of the youth by bandits in Montreal, Canada, in January, 1922. For several weeks Bernstein was a patient in a Montreal hospital and eventually recovered and returned home.

The bullet was never extracted and it is believed that it later worked into a vital part of the brain and caused death.

Wins Suit to Recover for Loss at Cards

Springfield, Mass.—A decision in favor of the plaintiff for $1,206 alleged to have been lost at cards in the home of friends has been handed down by District Court Judge James E. Davis.

Leo Guertin, the plaintiff, testified that he played in the home of the defendants, Frank and Lea Lavoie, with their full knowledge and consent on 12 occasions and that he lost on the average of $100 a night. Whether the defendants won the money or not was not the point at issue. The point stressed was that the game was played with their knowledge in their homes.

Counsel for the plaintiff explained that the suit was brought under a statute that says when a householder permits a gambling game in his premises he may be held liable for the amount lost by a plaintiff.

Every Car in Train Hits Auto; Driver Is Spared

Iron Mountain, Mich.—Pinned behind the wheel of his sedan, which was struck at a railroad crossing by a freight train while his car was being bumped by every passing freight car and expecting to be crushed to death any moment, was the experience of James McMahon, Sagola, traveling salesman. He escaped with minor injuries.

McMahon said he did not see the train in time to escape the crash because snow was falling heavily. His car was tossed to the side of the road and lay there while the passing freight cars bumped it repeatedly.

Little Girl's Tears Bring Back Father's Memory

Chattanooga, Tenn.—A child's heartbroken cry, "Don't you know me, daddy?" brought back memory to Enos C. King of this city, a victim of amnesia since last fall.

King left Chattanooga to go to Philadelphia. At Toledo, Ohio, he lost his memory and soon was penniless. Through his finger prints the Toledo Red Cross identified him and sent him to his wife and baby. These he did not recognize until the girl cried because her father did not know her.

This modern age puts Camels first

THIS age tried Camels and placed them first. And it was no half-way verdict. Never in the history of smoking was a cigarette given a leadership like Camel has today.

To find why Camels are the favorite, just try them. You will find the perfect fragrance and taste of choice tobaccos, rarely blended. You will experience a mellow mildness that gives endless cigarette enjoyment!

No Private Weddings

When people are married in Brazil everybody may come to the wedding. Weddings and funerals are public functions in that republic. Officials arrive before the hour and open all the doors and windows of the home, indicating the ceremony is open to the public. A long procession from the home of the bride to the church is an important part of the ceremony. The longer the procession the wealthier the bride or bridegroom. Same way with funerals.—Capper's Weekly.

His Symptoms

"Howdy-do, Mr. Rezzidew!" saluted an acquaintance. "How are you feeling these days?"

"Well, I'll just tell you, Newton," replied old Riley Rezzidew of Petunia. "I ain't feeling a-tall well. I've got a pain in my left leg, a rising in my head, twisting in my intestines, a disj'inted spine, symptoms of a snake in my stummuck and falling hair, and some indications of leprosy, hydrophobia and smallpox; I therefore conclude that I am about to come down with the grippe."—Kansas City Star.

Nature vs. Science

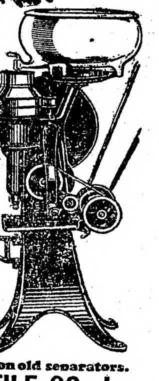
Putting Teeth in Separator Claims



TALK is cheap, and it is easy to make extravagant claims. This is true of cream separator claims. If there is the slightest doubt in your mind which separator really does skim cleanest, just try this simple test:

Put a De Laval side-by-side with any other separator of approximate capacity. Your De Laval Agent will gladly arrange this test. Mix 20 gallons of milk thoroughly and let it stay at normal room temperature of 70 degrees. Run half through each machine. Wash the bowl and tinware of each machine in its own skim-milk. Then run the De Laval skim-milk through the other machine and vice versa. Weigh and test for butter-fat the cream that each gets from the other's skim-milk. When you do this you will know beyond doubt that the De Laval skims cleaner, is easier to turn and more profitable to own.

The new De Laval is the best cream separator ever made. It has the wonderful "floating" bowl—the greatest separator improvement in 25 years. It is guaranteed to skim cleaner, run easier and last longer. It is the crowning achievement of 48 years of separator manufacture and leadership.

Liberal trade allowances made on old separators.

COUNTY ASSSESORS GO TO SCHOOL AT WARREN

Marshall county assesors will go to school before they start making their 1927 assessments. When a one day school will be conducted for all assessors at Warren on April 27, according to a decision by the Minnesota Tax Commission.

A statewide campaign for better assessors is now already in progress with members of the tax commission holding schools almost daily in every county of the state teaching the assessor to have a clear understanding of the law on which he must base valuation.

Instructions in an attempt to obtain uniform valuation in all parts of the state and to avoid work later on the part of reviewing boards of equalization in making adjustments to individual taxpayers is the aim.

Notice to Stockholders & Patrons of the Farmers' Co-operative Creamery Company of Holt, Minn.:

On March 31st, 1927, the Manager and the President of the Thief River Falls Co-Op. Creamery met with the board of directors of the Holt Creamery. This meeting was called for the purpose of selling our buttermilk to them. An agreement was made whereby they buy our buttermilk for one year, same to take effect about April 15th, 1927.

It is considered advisable and good business to sell your products where you get the best price and the most money, therefore it was unanimously agreed to dispose of our buttermilk for one year to the Thief River Falls Co-Op. Creamery.

We realize that there a few patrons that would like to buy buttermilk, some wanting only a can and others more. We further realize that creamery after creamery is going into the making of buttermilk powder. It is a known fact that for raising hogs, poultry, and turkeys on buttermilk, the farmer cannot come out on it when he has to compete with the prices you can get for buttermilk made into buttermilk powder.

Buttermilk for human consumption, in small lots, can be had now as heretofore, but the agreement calls for all the rest. The Board feel that they have acted wisely in this matter. They have agreed on something that will mean at least twice as much money for our buttermilk as we got before.

MINNESOTA FARMERS PLAN ADV. CAMPAIGN

With the formation of the Minnesota unit of the National Dairy Council, farmers of the leading butter state in the union are making good their word that they are willing to take up a national publicity program on the food value of dairy products to increase their market and to stabilize future prices.

No longer can it be claimed that Minnesota dairy farmers are unwilling to co-operate with dairymen of other states in securing a better market for their products. That such a statement is absolutely without basis is the contention of the Minnesota Dairy Council in referring to its own record as proof that producers of creamery butter in Minnesota are keenly interested in increasing the consumption of their products in Eastern markets.

WHEN you take PERTUSSIN to relieve your cough, you are taking one of the most widely used and effective cough remedies, known to every practising physician and pharmacist.

It is a most satisfactory treatment for all harmful coughs, because (1) it quickly relieves the cough spasms, (2) it soothes the inflamed throat and bronchial tissues, (3) it is absolutely harmless and, (4) most important of all, it helps Nature to hasten recovery by clearing the air passages of germ-laden phlegm.

Sold by all druggists in large and small bottles.

Artichoke Sugar

Levulose, called the finest of all sugars, is prophesied from artichokes at 2 cents a pound within five years, as the result of further experiments by the United States bureau of standards. Crystallization of the levulose from a water solution marks the turning point of the bureau's experiments, for in all previous work treatment with alcohol was necessary. The new development, says Popular Science Monthly, may place artichoke sugar on the same footing with cane or beet sugar as a commercial process.

With the Help of His Sisters

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

(Copyright.)

"THE trouble with you, Ken," cried Kenneth's sister Jane, "is that you want the moon!"

"Exactly," chimed in his other sister Carlotta. "You have a limousine appetite on a silver purse. If you'd only pick one of our crowd to take around instead of Miss Highty-tighty Vandeeveer, you wouldn't have to bother with taxi bills and orchid bouquets."

Left alone, the two girls discussed the situation with the frankness of extreme youth.

"You know she's just keeping Ken dangling," declared Carlotta bitterly. "When Polly Vandeeveer gets through with Ken she'll simply discard him as she does last week's hat!"

"I know," agreed Jane. "Ken's such a good looker and peach of a fox trotter, and all that. But if there were anyone else around—"

Carlotta grasped her sister's arm. "I've an idea!" she cried. "Let's have a party and introduce her to Mr. Van Dyke Beard next door. They're two of a kind and if they should fall for each other, it might, so to speak, release our Ken."

"Think he'll come?" asked Jane.

"Come? Of course, he'll come if we tell him we're going to have French ice cream with strawberry marshmallow sauce!"

As a matter of fact, it wasn't their next-door neighbor who hesitated to accept the invitation to the Misses Malcolm's lawn party. Mr. Jonathan Barnes—his name was not actually Mr. Van Dyke Beard, he merely wore one—declared at once his pleasure in being asked and his intention of coming.

It was Ken who introduced difficulties. At first, he flatly refused.

"Nothing doin'!" he said. "Hate parties myself, and so does Polly. You think she's snobbish, but I tell you she's just plain shy."

"I guess she'd come quick enough," snapped Jane meanly, "if you told her that the well known portrait painter, who has been secluding himself all summer, has decided to come out of his shell and show himself. None other than Jonathan Barnes!"

"Think so?" retorted Ken. "All right. I'll tell her he's to be here and you see if it doesn't make her stay away all the more!"

Poor Ken! It was with a hurt and bewildered air that, on the following day, he meekly sought his sisters.

"You win," he said. "I don't understand it myself, but when I told Polly about your old artist she said to tell you she'd be simply delighted to come. Girls are certainly darn queer!"

Jane and Carlotta exchanged glances. Clever little matchmakers they thought themselves.

They fairly spread themselves for the garden party in the way of decorations, refreshments, entertainment. Secretly, each felt she was assisting in the noble work of snatching a beloved brother from the arms of a Circe and, at the same time, getting a mighty lot of fun out of it.

Kenneth, morose and unhappy, had gone after Polly and his heart fairly quivered when he saw what a lovely vision she was in yellow crepe de chine and wide-brimmed yellow hat. What man, artist or otherwise, that would not be smitten dumb at sight of Polly?

Jane introduced Mr. Barnes to Miss Vandeeveer, while Carlotta of choice and Kenneth of necessity remained in the background. But all three of them were thunderstruck by the words with which the other two greeted one another.

"So you do remember me—"

"Three years ago at Wake Robin Lodge—"

Jane and Carlotta left them and, when hidden by a clump of syringas, hugged one another.

"It's Fate!" said Jane.

"Who would have dreamed they had already met! Our work is half done! Poor Ken!" cried Carlotta.

They decided they must be very kind to poor Ken. He would need their sympathy, even if, in the end, it was the very best thing that could happen to him, to be jilted by a Vandeeveer, and left free for some girl of simpler tastes. Carlotta had a friend coming to visit her—a nice, domestic little thing.

When Ken came back from taking Polly home, he heard his sisters talking in the couch hammock.

"Congratulations on your party, girls," he said pleasantly.

"Thanks," said Jane.

"Congratulate me, too," he said gaily.

"You, Ken?" This from both girls.

"Exactly! You know, I've been wanting to get a definite answer from Polly for ages, but she's held off and I just learned why. Seems three summers ago she had a crush on a man. She was just a kid, but she kept wondering if it was the real thing and if she ever saw him again if she'd feel the same way. Well, she's seen him, and says she wouldn't marry him if he was the last man on earth! You know who I mean. Our neighbor—the artist!"

"Mr. Van Dyke Beard!"

"I'll be jiggered!"

"Yes," said Kenneth. "So, thanks to you, I've got—"

"Your limousine!" said Jane in a funny little voice.

"Exactly," said Kenneth calmly.

"Thanks to us!" said Carlotta. "Oh, Jane!"

BILLY EMERSON LIVES QUIETLY

Golden-Voiced Minstrel Is Now Past Seventy.

Newport, Ky.—Billy Emerson, whose golden voice formerly thrilled thousands of minstrelsy lovers all over America and Europe, is living quietly in Newport. He is well over seventy now, but his voice retains much of the sweetness that brought him fame when he was a star among all the luminaries. He sings with a haunting lilt that brings back old memories, but there is nothing of the "old-timer" about Mr. Emerson. He is as chipper as he was in the nights when his bounding upon the stage brought as much applause as does the appearance of even the most effete star of the stage in these times.

Mr. Emerson is probably the last of the noted minstrel men of the earlier day. He has made numerous tours of America and has had experiences enough to crowd a book of "memories." But he does not live in the past, though he does talk of the moguls of minstrel times when he is urged.

Mr. Emerson, with Mrs. Emerson, lives quietly here, ever and anon going out for an evening when Mr. Emerson obliges with some of his successes in the days when minstrel men were minstrel men. Mrs. Emerson, upon whose hair snows of age have fallen, accompanies her husband on the piano.

Mr. Emerson's reminiscence of old days in the black-face art brings up names that read like a roll of honor of the men who have amused millions, and most of whom have outstripped "Billy" Emerson on the way to the golden shore. He has known them all—Lew Dockstader, Jack Haverly, Al Fields, George Evans, and all the leading funsters of the last 50 or 60 years.

Ship Frozen in Arctic Gets U. S. Radio Bills

Montreal.—The steamer Bay Maude, locked in the frozen waters of the Arctic ocean at Bernard harbor, has been receiving the special Far-North programs, states a wireless message from Aklavik, Northwest territories. Word was sent through this station by the crew of the Bay Maude to Montreal that perfect reception accompanied all the programs.

Aklavik is situated in the delta of the Mackenzie river, which empties into the Arctic ocean, about 600 miles west of Bernard harbor. The lattter is a minor bay of Coronation gulf, about five degrees from the North pole. On a schedule arranged nearly a year in advance, four programs sent from as many stations have entertained members of the Royal Canadian mounted police, traders, trappers, missionaries and other inhabitants of the remote Arctic.

The farthest north settlement in the world, Bache peninsula, in Ellesmereland, is included in these posts, which receive the cheering radio entertainment.

Plan to Move Canadian Town to Higher Land

Bella Coola, B. C.—Residents here have decided to tow their village across the river and transplant it bodily on a bluff, where the view of snow-clad Cascade range peaks is better.

Each spring, when the snow melts in the highlands, the Bella Coola river goes on a rampage. The town is inundated in places and even threatened with destruction. It was deemed cheaper and safer to move the town than attempt changing the course of the stream or build barricades.

Townsfolk here are optimistic over the exodus. They are certain, anyway, that the scenery will be better and are eagerly awaiting a mass meeting to be held soon, at which they will draw lots for sites of their new homes. The government has given them the new town site free of charge.

Some difficulty is anticipated in moving the town across the river, although a majority of the business houses and homes are frame structures.

Shortest Railroad in World Sells for $1,100

Kalama, Wash.—The town of Union, Ore., now owns the shortest railroad in the world, having bid in and purchased the utility at a sale for delinquent taxes. The road, sold by the sheriff, owed many thousands of dollars. It is ten miles long, constructed years ago to connect the territory with the Oregon Short Line at Cove. The purchase price, $1,100, includes a locomotive, one passenger and three freight cars as rolling stock.

GIFT OF $1,000,000 NETS DUKE $740,000

Gives Library to Columbia for $60,000 Annuity.

New York.—How an annuity provision attached to a $1,000,000 gift to Columbia university left the university even, enabled the donor to receive $1,740,000 and cost a life insurance company $1,040,000 more than it received has just been disclosed.

Joseph Florimond, the Duc de Loubat and former New York clubman, the donor, died at ninety-six in Paris 29 years after his donation of an improved and well-rented building in downtown Broadway to the university for its library.

The decline of real estate values since the gift was made and the duke's unexpected long life were the governing factors in the philanthropic gamble.

Only Worth $700,000.

The property today is valued at $700,000—the amount spent by Columbia to insure the annuity when receipts from the property threatened to fall below the amount needed for the annuity payments.

The Duc de Loubat was sixty-seven when he made the gift. While he drew $1,740,000 in 27 annuities he lived abroad and acted as patron to the arts and sciences in Europe, distributing part of his annual check from Columbia to foreign institutions.

Enthusiasm prevailed at Columbia at the time the gift was accepted. Provisions of the deed of gift were that after the $60,000 annuity was paid, the balance of receipts annually was to go to the university, and at the death of the donor the entire income was to be used for a library in honor of the duke's parents, which, Columbia hoped, would be the greatest in the country. Life expectancy tables showed the probability of the duke's living 12 years after he made the gift.

Planned Huge Library.

It soon became apparent that the annuity, taxes and other expenses exceeded receipts. For four years Columbia made up the difference. Then it bought a $60,000 annuity for the duke from an insurance company.

If Columbia breaks even on the property, it will be ahead in its relations with the duke. He gave the university $10,000 for book prizes in 1892 and added $100,000 in 1903 for a chair of American archeology.

Marrying Brother's Son's Widow Is Held Illegal

London.—A curious oversight in the law of England makes it illegal for a man to marry his brother's son's widow, though he can marry his brother's widow.

This was revealed in a ruling by Magistrate Clarke Hall after studying two "marriage problems" put before him. They were: "Can I marry the widow of my brother's son?" and "Can I marry my late wife's mother's sister?" The questions were asked by two men, each of whom insisted he was deeply in love with the woman in question. The magistrate ruled:

"These marriages are forbidden under the old law as set out in the tables at the end of the Book of Common Prayer. The prohibited degree of relationship has been modified comparatively recently by the acts of 1907 and 1921, whereby marriage is permitted with a deceased wife's sister and a deceased brother's widow. Apparently it never occurred to the legislature in passing these acts to extend them to what is a far more remote relationship, namely, a brother's son's wife."

30 Years a Minister; Uses Obey Only Once

Murfreesboro, Tenn.—Thousands of marriage ceremonies but only one "obey" in 30 years, is the record of Rev. E. L. Atwood, president of the Murfreesboro college for young women.

The only time he included "obey" was at the request of the bride—and he hasn't been able to figure out yet why she asked.

"Love, honor—and esteem," he says. "Obey brings friction and trouble. Marriage today is regarded as a partnership and a mutual obligation. Our modern girl has a mind of her own and uses it regardless of what other people think. It is no more fair or sane to expect her to promise to obey the husband than to expect him to promise to obey her."

Biggest New Englander Jailed, Perils Supplies

Providence, R. I.—Nick Tartaglione, the biggest man in New England, who tips the scales at 518 pounds, was sentenced to seven months in jail and fined $100 and costs in Superior court here for violating the prohibition law. His attorney warned the court that the state would have to pass a special appropriation to feed the man in jail.

"Big Nick" traveled with a circus and gave public demonstrations on the stage of his enormous food capacity. A "fair meal," in his view, was five pounds of spaghetti, two chickens, four lobsters, a loaf of bread and a gallon of wine. He is the father of 17 children.

$250 PRODUCTS OUT OF TON OF STRAW

Gas for Autos Even Declared Possible.

New York.—A process by which a ton of straw may be burned to extract $250 worth of useful products from the smoke has been discovered by George H. Harrison, an industrial chemist, according to announcement by the magazine Farm and Fireside.

The chemist, it is said, has obtained 1,600 pounds of products from each ton of wheat or oat straw, the products including a new germicide favorably reported on by the Mayo brothers of Rochester, a roofing and damp-proofing paint, and a fly spray.

It is even possible, but not yet economically practical, to run an automobile on gas obtained from the straw, the magazine quotes the chemist as saying in an interview accorded in his laboratory near St. Paul Park, Minn.

"There is, indeed," said Mr. Harrison, "hardly any limit to the products that can be derived from straw by destructive distillation. When the process has grown up to its possibilities every American farmer who grows grain will feel the difference. Even now, if you would take me to a farm and offer me the grain or the straw, I would take the straw. Potentially, at least, it is the more valuable of the two."

Justice Qualifies as Authority on Mules

Raleigh, N. C.—There is no telling when a mule will kick, and the only way to escape danger is not to go near the heels of one, the North Carolina Supreme court holds.

Associate Justice Brogden, graduate of a farm in Wayne county, does the writing in the case of Mrs. Sam Rector vs. Southern Coal company, and reverses the lower court which refused to grant a nonsuit in a personal injury case in which the plaintiff was awarded $600 in damages.

It was not alleged that the husband of the plaintiff, who has since died, was kicked, but that he was pressed to the wall of the stable by a mule. He had gone in the stable to look for eggs and there was no evidence that the mule had been vicious before.

"What duty does the owner of a mule owe to an employee who has charge of the mule and gets into the stable where the mule is?"

Here's the question to which the jurist from Durham addresses himself in the opinion in which he expatiates on mule lore. "A mule is a melancholy creature," the jurist remarks. "It is a nullius filius in the animal kingdom. It has been said that a mule has neither 'pride of ancestry nor hope of posterity.' It is a matter of common knowledge among men who know mules and deal with them that they are uncertain, moody and morose."

Pair of Boots Makes Trip to Pole Twice

Seattle, Wash.—Several men claim the honor of having flown over the North pole once, but Commander Richard Byrd, arctic flyer, has a pair of boots with him in Seattle that has made the trip twice. Byrd had the boots made in Nome by an Eskimo for his flight across the pole. They were shipped 500 miles by dog team, then on to New York. Byrd took them with him to Spitzbergen and wore them when he successfully crossed the pole in his plane.

When he returned Byrd loaned the boots to Lincoln Ellsworth, who wore them when he crossed the pole in the dirigible Norge with Amundsen.

Prisoner Makes Up Payroll Under Guard

Battle Creek, Mich.—Mark Richardson, arrested for embezzling the bonus check of a shell-shocked war veteran, made out the $80,000 payroll of the Veterans' Bureau hospital, No. 100, while under guard of Deputy United States Marshal J. Cooper Huffman.

Richardson's arrest brought to light the fact that he is the only person connected with the institution who is qualified to issue the pay checks. Through the efforts of hospital officials Richardson was taken from his cell at the police headquarters here and conveyed to the hospital, where he consented to make out the payroll.

The Leading Lady

By GERALDINE BONNER

WNU Service
(Copyright by The Bobbs-Merrill Co.)

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play, which is a big hit, Wally Shine, official photographer, learns something of the jealousy existing in the company.

The photographer shouldered his camera and went toward the house. He skirted the side balcony, the wide-flung doors giving a glimpse of an entrance hall, and turning the corner emerged upon the land front of the long capacious building. Hayworth showed across the channel in a clustering of gray roofs from which smoke skeins rose straight into the suave rose-washed sky. The water rushed between, a swollen tide, threads of white dimpled eddies, telling of its racing speed.

The door on this side of the house opened directly into the living room. No hall within or porch without interfered with the view; the path ended unceremoniously at the foot of two broad steps that led to the threshold. On the lower of these steps Shine found a lady sitting smoking a cigarette. This was the Maria of the cast, Mrs. Cornell in private life. Shine had found her as easy as himself, good humoredly loquacious and not involved in the prevailing discord. An admirable person to clear up mysteries. He sank down beside her on the step and took the cigarette box she flipped toward him.

"Wouldn't you think," she said, "a man as rich as this Driscoll would fix up round here better?"

Shine, who had artistic responses, had long learned not to intrude them on the uninitiated.

"I guess he liked it wild," he suggested, and lit a cigarette.

Shine had been in the grove of pines, a growth of stunted trees filling in a hollow. He had followed the path through it, up the slope to the summer house and beyond to where the bluff dropped away in a sheer cliff to the channel. They called the place "The Point" as it projected beyond the shore line in a rocky outthrust shoulder, gulls circling about it, water seething below. He looked there now, let his glance slip along the curve of headlands till it reached the two girls, perched on a boulder like a pair of bright-plumaged birds. He was thinking how to approach the matter in his mind, when Mrs. Cornell went on:

"I don't see what anyone wanted to build a house here for—cut off this way. It's too lonesome. With the tide at the full as it is now you can't get ashore without a motor boat. You know that current's something fierce."

He looked down at it, its rushing corded surface purple dark:

"Looks to be some current."

"It would carry you out and 'Good night' to you. Gabriel who runs the launch told me. Set's right out to sea someway. And the rise and fall to it—I couldn't tell you how many feet it is, but you'll see for yourself tonight if you're awake—all the channel bare, nothing but rocks and mud. And across the middle of it to Hayworth, a causeway. That's the only way you can get ashore at low tide. High or low you're pretty well marooned. It's seclusion, all right, if that's what you're after."

Shine was after information and with the talk running on tides and causeways he saw no chance of getting it. So he tried to divert the garrulous lady:

"That's Miss Saunders and Miss Tracy out there looking at the sunset."

Mrs. Cornell answered with emphasis:

"Yes, they're friends."

"Aren't you all?"

"Some of us knew each other before we came here," was her cryptic reply. Then she added pensively: "Six months ago you'd never have found Sybil Saunders looking at a sunset. She was the brightest thing!"

"Awful misfortune that what happened to her."

She gave a derisive sound at the inadequacy of the word:

"Hah—awful! Took the heart right out of her. If you ever saw a girl in love it was she—bound up in him. Everything ready, the wedding day set, the trousseau made." Tears rose in her eyes and she dove into her tight-fitting bodice for a handkerchief. "Never to be worn, Mr. Shine—that's life."

Shine gave forth sympathetic murmurs and Mrs. Cornell, dabbing at her eyes, furnished data between the dabs:

"Two men drinking too much and then a fight, and before anybody knew, murder. If there hadn't been a brass candlestick near Jim Dallas' hand it would never have happened. Honest to God, Mr. Shine, there was nothing evil in that young man. But the Parkinson family are camped on his trail. The evil's in them, if you ask me, with their rewards and detectives."

"I wonder if she knows where he is."

"I guess there's more than one wondering that," the lady murmured.

Shine looked at the page's figure on the rock. She carried the thing stamped on her face. He had noticed it particularly where he had taken the photographs of her in the living room. Once or twice the mask had been dropped, and he had seen the drooping lines, the weariness, and something like fear on the delicate features.

For a space they smoked in silence. Round the corner of the house the tall figure of Stokes strolled into view. At the sight of them he nodded, walked down to the wharf and dropped on a bench.

Shine lowered his voice:

"What's the matter with him?"

Mrs. Cornell met his eyes; her own were narrowed and sharp.

"What makes you think anything is?"

"His whole makeup—something's wearing on him."

She blew out a long shoot of smoke and, watching it, murmured:

"Yes, it's out on him like a rash. He's crazy about Sybil, if you want to know what's the matter with him."

"Oh!" It came with an understanding inflection, the haggard glances rising on Shine's memory.

"Can't hide it, doesn't want to hide it. There's no shame in him, tracking after the girl. And it's not as if he got any encouragement. She can't bear him; that's why she has Anne Tracy out there, afraid if she sits alone five minutes he'll come loping up. You'd think if he didn't have any pride he'd have some feeling for his wife. She's half crazy with jealousy, burning up with it. These purple passions are all right in books, Mr. Shine, but believe me they're not comfortable to live with."

"I felt it."

"I guess you would, it's in the air. All of us cooped up in this place where you can't get off. Sybil and Joe Tracy ready to fight at the drop of the hat and Flora going round in circles and Stokes like one of those fireworks that starts sputtering and you don't know whether they're going to explode or die on you. I tell you I'll be glad when we get out of here tomorrow morning."

There was a footfall in the room behind them and Mrs. Cornell turned to see who was coming.

"Oh, Flora," she said. "Come out and take a look at the sunset. It's something grand."

The woman stepped out and stood beside them. She had changed her costume and her narrow blue linen dress outlined her too slender figure. Shine thought she would have been pretty if she had not looked so worn and thin. He noticed the brightness of her dark eyes, brilliant and quick moving as a bird's. There was red on her cheekbones, a flushed patch that was not rouge. Mrs. Cornell's expression recurred to him, "burning up"—the meager body, the hot high color, the dry lips resolutely smiling, suggested inner fires.

"Yes," she answered, "it's a wonderful evening."

"Take a cig." Mrs. Cornell offered the box.

"Sit down, there's plenty of room." Shine moved up.

"No, I can't sit down. There's something about the air that makes you restless—too stimulating, maybe." She raised her voice and called to her husband, "Aleck, aren't you coming in to change your clothes?"

Without moving, the man called back:

"Not yet. There's no hurry."

She turned to Shine with a litle condoning air of wifely tolerance:

"Mr. Stokes has been shut up so long in town he can't get enough of the fresh air."

"He's enjoying the scenery, too," Shine answered, and saw her eyes travel to the two figures on the rock.

"Oh, that of course—that's the best part of it." Then in a tone of bright discovery: "Why, look where Anne and Sybil are! Have they been there long?"

"Ever since I've been here." Mrs. Cornell's voice was more than soothing, bluffly reassuring as the voice of one who tells a child there is no ghost. "And ever since Mr. Shine got through the pictures! Wallowing in the beauties of nature like the rest of us."

"Won't you wallow, too?" Shine indicated the long unoccupied space on the step.

She shook her head:

"I like moving about. Something in this place gets on my nerves, it's like being in a jail." On a deep breath she shot out, "I hate it," and stepped back into the room.

"Going?" Mrs. Cornell veered round to follow her retreating figure.

"Yes. I enjoy the scenery better when it hasn't got people in it."

They looked at each other; a still minute of eye communication.

"She's all worked up," he murmured.

Her answer was to point to the two girls and then to Stokes:

"Now she'll keep her eye on them from somewhere else—probably the side piazza. That's the way you are when you're jealous—the sight of it kills you and you can't stop watching."

"Lord!" whispered Shine into whose life no such gnawing passions had entered. And he thought of the girl in the page's dress who was afraid to sit alone, and the man on the wharf brooding within sight of her, and the woman who was hovering round them like a helpless distracted bird.

CHAPTER II

The launch was on its way back for those of the actors who were leaving. Gabriel, squatting by the engine, calculated the distribution of his time. After he'd taken them across he'd have his supper and then go back for Joe Tracy, who was leaving on the seven-fifteen for his vacation. When Joe was disposed of, Gabriel was to meet two Boston sports who had engaged him for a week's deep-sea fishing at White beach, twenty-five miles down the coast. It was a strenuous program for the old man and he grumbled to himself about it, the grumbling gaining zest by anticipations that some of them would be late. By the time he drew near the island he had grumbled himself into a state of irascible defiance against anyone who would dare upset his plans.

To warn them of his coming he sounded the whistle and its shrill toot acted like a magic summons. A group of men, bearing suitcases and bags, emerged from the entrance and ran down the path, Bassett following.

Gabriel quieted down—they were all ready and waiting—and then saw Joe Tracy come round the corner of the house in his Sebastian dress. The old man muttered profanely—why wasn't the d—d cub getting ready? And as the boat made its landing, he called out:

"Say, you'd better be gettin' them togs off. I'll be back here for you at a quarter to seven."

The boy, leaping lightly from rock to rock, grinned without answering. The picturesque dress suited him, he looked almost handsome, and with the feathered cap on his golden wig set rakishly aslant, he moved downward with a taunting debonair swagger. Gabriel didn't like him, anyway, and now his impudent face, framed by the drooping blond curls, looked to the launch man malignantly spiteful.

But Gabriel wasn't going to go till he'd made things clear. He appealed to Bassett, whom he had privately sized up as the only one of the outfit who was like the rational human males of his experience. Besides he had seen that Joe Tracy respected, if not feared, the director:

"I'll be back here at quarter to seven for the Tracy boy, and I'm tellin' him he's got to be ready. I can't waste no time settin' round waitin' and if he's not here on the dot—"

"That's all right," Bassett put a comforting hand on his shoulder and turned to Joe. "You heard that, Joe?"

The boy answered with his sneering grin:

"What's got the old geezer? Does he think I'm as deaf as he is?"

Gabriel's weather-beaten visage reddened. He was not in the habit of being called an "old geezer" and he was not deaf. But the actors, all in the boat, were clamoring to start. They had a train to make—get in, ancient servitor, and turn on the current. In a chorus of farewells the boat chugged off.

The three men left on the wharf went up the path to the doorway where Shine and Mrs. Cornell had resumed their seats. Shine was struck by their difference of type—if you went the world over you couldn't find three more varied specimens. The only one he liked was Bassett, something square and solid about him and a good straight look in his eyes. And he'd a lot of authority—the way he managed this wild-eyed bunch showed that.

Material Needed to Make Up Square Meal

The familiar expression "a square meal" may be adapted to represent a complete diet supplying all the material that the body needs, say R. H. A. Plimmer of the University of London and Violet G. Plimmer in Hygeia Magazine. The center of the square is filled with the fat, carbohydrate, mineral salts and water; the corners are filled respectively with vitamines A, B and C and protein P.

The corner A represents both the fat soluble vitamines A and D, which are found in the same foods. Foods from the same corner may be used alternatively, but a food from one corner is not a substitute for one from another corner. A square meal consists of food from all four corners in suitable proportions.

Some of the foods in the A corner are butter, cod liver oil, milk, egg yolk and liver; in the C corner are fresh fruits, especially citrus fruits, tomatoes and green vegetables either raw or very slightly cooked; the B corner contains whole meal cereal products, dried peas, beans and lentils and nuts; corner P includes meat, eggs, milk and cheese and fish.

Talent Not to Be Hidden

There is no man so humble as not to have received some legacy, some talent, which properly developed will be valuable to himself and a blessing to his fellows. Every man owes it to himself and his fellows to make the most of his talent.—Grit.

Alphonse and Gaston

Easily the most astounding motor event of 1926 occurred in one of the year's traffic jams, says Motor Magazine.

Two cars collided with damaging effect on both, but the drivers were unhurt. One man jumped to the street and declared that he was entirely to blame for the accident, and apologized profusely. But the second driver protested vigorously.

"This one is on me," was the retort. Whereupon history was made.

Torture

"I think," said the great social student, "I think it was a mistake to abolish the ducking stool for gossiping women. There should be some way to punish a woman who gossips."

"There is," said the practical guy. "All you gotta do is just blindfold her when new people are moving into her neighborhood so that she can't see what kind o' furniture they've got, and let 'er suffer!"—Brockton Enterprise.

Pompadour Home to Go

The Chateau de la Muette, once the home of Madames de Pompadour and du Barry, is to be torn down to make way for progress in Paris. The chateau is on the edge of the Bois de Boulogne. It has had many notable historical tenants, among them the duchess du Barry, who was credited with having had 800 servants at one time and with having saturated her rooms with perfumes. This was in 1716.

Ton in Spadeful

If the stars being studied by the astro-physicists could be weighed actually, instead of by mathematical computation, it would be found that a spadeful would weigh a ton. The stars are accordingly much denser than the earth. The earth is said to be only about five and a half times as heavy as water.

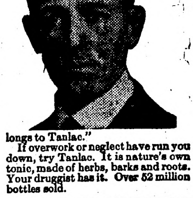
Dakotan Praises Tanlac Rebuilt Lost Health

Blain Harris, well known in business circles, tells of breakdown. Tanlac built him up and earns his praise

Mr. Harris lives at 613 Farrington St., Devils Lake, N. D. Naturally robust, he worked hard and enjoyed life. Then stomach trouble developed. "Following an operation for appendicitis," said Mr. Harris, "a general rundown condition resulted. I could not sleep restfully at night, had neither appetite nor energy. Food lay like a rock in my stomach and I lost 15 lbs. in weight.

"On my brother-in-law's advice, I tried Tanlac, and a couple of bottles convinced me, for I noticed a great improvement. I kept on till about 12 were finished and I can honestly say they put me in an entirely different condition. Tanlac gave me a ravenous appetite, put my stomach and liver in normal condition again and steadied my nerves. I sleep regularly, too. I'm in splendid health now, have gained back my lost weight, and as I took no other remedy, the whole credit belongs to Tanlac."

If overwork or neglect have run you down, try Tanlac. It is nature's own tonic, made of herbs, barks and roots. Your druggist has it. Over 52 million bottles sold.



Rainbow's End

"You're a lucky dog, Bings," said the fellow in the next chair. "They tell me you're making three times as much money as you did last year."

"Yeah," Bings replied wearily, "but my women folks found it out."—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

J. P. Augustine holds 1st with a large margin. Arno Steinhauer again ranks second. The tip given us last month about J. Benitt evidently is correct, as he sure did move up into the king row in a hurry. Anton Rodahl, one of our many good patrons also made a jump forward worthy of mention. Last month he ranked 8th and this month 4th on the list, Rodahl is getting his herd bred up and now ranks among the good ones, he has also learned that you must feed your cows something else than wild hay in order to get results. Our good friend Bill Mehrkens holds 5th place. Bill is doing fine as a dairyman and my hope is that his health will improve as well.

A word regarding the Land O' Lakes state convention should be in line at this time. I have attended a good many conventions in my days, most of them pertaining to dairying and buttermaking, every one of them have been of much good to anyone in attendance, yet I must say that the Land O' Lakes convention is by far the greatest of its kind, yes, in fact the outstanding one in importance in our great state, bar none. Approximately 4000 people assembled in this convention to listen to a program that was prepared for the occasion. Few of us realize the strength and bigness of this Ass'n. Figures sometimes must be put in print and studitd for sometime in order to really learn what they mean. I shall mention just a few that I want you to try and remember. This association of is made up of 420 creameries backed by 90.000 farmers. Last year they marketed and sold about 80,000,000 pounds butter, several hundred carloads of sweet cream, total amount of business about $40,000,000.00. The cooperative spirit in this convention reigns high and any man that attended and failed to get an inspiration is passed the stage of hope.

One of the speakers left a good thought with me that I want you to know whether you take any stock in it or not that is your business, nevertheless it is a fact and a serious fact. He said that we have 4 cooperative marketing associations doing business effectively and every one of them should be backed up by the farmer if he knew his own good and knew it in time. The 4 are Land O' Lakes Livestock Poultry Ass'n and Grain Growers. The first 3 are where our farmers should be interested. He said that to join anyone of them and then forget to deliver your products through them does not help the ass'n any. It might interest yot to know that 2 year ago when the T. R. Valley Poultry Ass'n was organized the price of eggs went up about 4 cents a dozen above what they used to pay based on the same market. Knowing this to be a fact I claim the poultry and livestock association should be patronized by all of the farmers that are interested in getting the most for their products. When a member asks you to join and support these organizations that means so much to you I say appreciate what they are responsible for, and made possible for you that never did a thing to get them started, get on the band wagon and help boost your own business. For an illustration, let us say Jones lives on one side of the road and is a 100 per cent member of the poultry ass'n he sold his 10 doz. eggs to his ass'n for 25 cents a dozen or $2.50. Smith who is across the from Jones sells same amount of eggs to a private concern for same price. Why did Smith get as much as Jones? Just because Jones and others like him keep their organization going is why Smith got the same price. If Smith refused to join when asked to do so by Jones, he should be sport enough to give Jones half of what he indirectly help him make on those eggs, which would be about 20c. It is the same with cream and everything else the farmers have to market. If they all dropped out of these associations you would realize it like they do down in the states where they have no creameries. In missouri not more then about a month ago cream producers received 13 cents a pound less for butterfat then you did here. Let us picture theis situation and see how you would like to have those conditions here, let your own conscience be your guide and do as they tell you.

Submitted by P. L. Anderson.

John Nelson of Hendrum, Minnesota arrived here last week to take charge of the shoe-repair shop which he purchased from Rudolph Nyhus. Mr. Nelson comes here with a number of years' experience as a shoe and harness repair man, and will, no doubt, enjoy a good business here. Mr. Nyhus, who has had the shop here the past few years, will start out as soon as the weather permits, to do some painting and carpenter work.

Murder---

According to items in a few of the exchanges which we received from along the Canadian border the last week, some farmers in Lake of the Woods county, who are supposed to be prosperous, went out and shot three moose cows and four calves. Game-Wardens Willems of Warroad and Lande of Baudette were put on the trail of the lawbreakers who had instituted the massacre of protected game, and soon ended the search for the violators.

According to last reports of this case, the game wardens have obtained a confession from one of the party, and that the one who had done the shooting was in bed with pneumonia. These men, if you will call them such, should pay for such a crime with a few months where they could not enjoy moose-meat.

Helmer Brenna went to Trail, Minnesota, last week, to spend some time attending to business matters.

Farmer Kraft is well known in No. Dakota. His home is on R. R. No. 1, Mandan. Relating to his breakdown and quick recovery, he states: "Pains in stomach and around my heart bothered me first. Then a draggy 'all-in' feeling came over me and I couldn't shake it off. I was weak, tired easily and at the end of the day would be exhausted. I had a hard time to keep up my end of the work. My nerves were shaky and I had to force myself to eat. That lasted several months.

"Tanlac was recommended and it certainly made good for me. On the third bottle I was eating and feeling as well as ever. The hardest work does not exhaust me. I haven't had a touch of indigestion or a pain of any kind since."

MEMBERS OPPOSE GUARANTY BILL

Joint Committee of Legislature Reports No Need for Drastic Measures.

St. Paul—A bank guaranty law is not feasible in Minnesota at present. the joint banking committee of the legislature holds, "and might be a dangerous step." Most of the recommendations of the department of banks and of the Minnesota Bankers Association are favored, however, as important steps to strengthen banks.

Since February 1 a joint committee of six has been conducting hearings, and made a thorough investigation of the banking situation. A group was sent to Nebraska to study the guaranty system there. Now work is done and findings reported Eighteen recommendations are made.

Most bills recommended by the joint committee have just been approved by the bank committee of the house, which will introduce them as committee bills. Bills already have been prepared.

Following the recommendations in which the joint committee concurs with the banking department and the bankers association:

Increase capital stock requirements.

Require building up of greater surplus.

Limit deposits to 20 times the capital of the bank.

Increase the amount of stocks a director must own.

Make limitation of loans permitted under the law apply to all members of a family, as to an individual.

Require sworn statement of financial status with unsecured loan of $500.

Make officer permitting excess loan guilty of misdeameanor and per-annually liable.

Prohibit a bank from pledging assets to secure public deposits, from borrowing money without consent of directors, from making a loan on real estate not secured by a first lien.

Authorize board of directors to appoint or remove officers or directors at will.

Make it a gross misdeameanor to maliciously circulate false statements as to a bank's condition.

Increase the staff of examiners in the banking department.

Permit the commissioner of banks to order stockholders assessment without court action, though providing for court appeal.

Authorize the commissioner to sell bad debts or property in an insolvent bank on apporval of court.

4 of 5 Crime Bills Are Rejected

Of five measures supported by the Minnesota crime commission and designed to improve criminal procedure, four were rejected and only one was recommended for passage by the senate judiciary committee. The committee recommended for passage a bill which would allow the supreme court to reduce the penalty in criminal cases under certain conditions. The court would be permitted to reduce the penalty when it finds in a criminal case that the evidence does not justify conviction on the charge under which the defendant was tried, but does sustain a lesser degree of the same offense. The present practice in such cases is for the supreme court to order a new trial.

A bill passed several days ago by the house prohibiting cities, towns and villages from instituting daylight saving by advancing the hands of the clock, was given consideration at a meeting of the senate committee on general legislation of which Senator J. D. Sullivan of St. Cloud is chairman.

House Scorns Schall Inquiry.

Minnesota's house of representatives decided that it would keep its hands off the senate's investigation of the 1924 election campaign of United States Senator Thomas D. Schall. By a vote of 88 to 28 it turned down the senate resolution proposing the extension of interim powers to its investigation committee. Action of the house was taken after the rules committee had recommended indefinite postponement of the resolution.

The senate crime prevention committee approved a plan for reorganization of the board of parole, although along slightly different lines than that recommended by the house crime prevention committee.

A flood of last minute bills in both houses gave the senate a total of 1,200 and the house 1,300, adding to the congestion. There were 114 bills introduced in the two houses.

Two of the bills seek to simplify election procedure in the largest cities, either by dual election boards or by a

Marshal Jumps From Train to Arrest Man

Owensboro, Ky.—As a Louisville & Nashville passenger train was passing through Central City, Deputy United States Marshal James Bales, who was aboard, noticed Luther Devine, a man he has sought for some time, standing on the platform. Bales jumped off the moving train, took Devine into custody and shoved him on the train. He then told Devine he had a warrant for his arrest, charging him with possessing 12 gallons of moonshine liquor.

Devine was brought to Owensboro, arraigned before United States Commissioner R. H. Slack, waived examining trial and was released on bond of $350 to appear before the May term of the federal grand jury.

TAME CHEETAH CHEWS COP'S LEG

Owner's Dissertation on Habits Not Convincing.

Chicago.—Half grown African cheetahs are all right in their place. But their place is out in a jungle with the other beasts or behind the bars of a good strong circus wagon, not in Lake Shore drive apartments.

So declares no less an authority than Brevet Sergeant Wellington W. Britton, well known-author and zoological expert of the Chicago police department. He feels that the marks of a cheetah's teeth on one of his legs qualify him as an expert.

The pair of cheetahs is owned by Mrs. John Wentworth, 1240 Lake Shore drive, and the council ordered the police to see if they are "a menace to public safety."

Twice the Wentworth maid refused him admittance, but finally Mr. Wentworth, called from his office, let him in. Percy and Nellie—the two cheetahs—lying on a white-sheeted couch, looked up at him hungrily. It was about supper time.

"Come over and pet them," Mr. Wentworth invited.

"No, thank you," Britton replied. "All I want between them and me is distance."

Mr. Wentworth then started to read to his visitor from a nature book, stating that cheetahs are gentle, harmless pets.

"Why, these cheetahs will eat right out of your hand," he said.

Just then Percy jumped down, walked up behind Britton, and took a nip at his leg.

"Yes," shouted the policeman, "maybe they'll eat out of your hand, but they'll eat out of my leg, too!" Then, turning on Percy, "Scat!" he ordered. But Percy didn't scat. He started to take another bite and the sergeant pulled out his artillery.

"Don't shoot Percy," entreated the owner. "He won't hurt you. Let me read you some more. It says here: 'They can be trained to hunt rabbits.'"

"Worse and worse," commented the detective. "They're nearsighted as well. He mistook me for a rare bit."

"He smells the odor of a dog," explained Mr. Wentworth, starting to read some more. . . .

At the detective bureau Britton wrote a classic bit on cheetahs, the erstwhile royal hunting leopards of Persian kings.

"Mr. Wentworth showed me a book that said they would not attack a man, but one bit my leg," Britton wrote.

Enraged Girl Beats Father, Blind, Veteran

Philadelphia.—Climaxing a series of marital difficulties, Albert Bauer, who alleges his sight became affected after service overseas with the Twenty-second infantry, was knocked down by his nineteen-year-old daughter, Anna.

He told police his family troubles were the result of bickering over his government pension. He declared that he developed spinal meningitis in France and when he came home blind, his wife would have nothing to do with him.

So many in number, between the ships and the streams of Xanthus, shone forth in front of Troy the fires kindled by the Trojans. Chinese Chef Master of Art, Says Writer

On the whole, well-cooked Chinese food is unsurpassable, writes Genevieve Wimsatt in "A Griffin in China;" and the occidental gourmand who overcomes his prejudices and eats the food of China for even a short period of time, finds that ever afterward all other cooking seems flat, tame and savorless to him. In Paris or Vienna or New Orleans, wherever he may dine, as long as he lives he will hunger for the oil-roasted duck of Peking, of which only the crisp, amber-brown skin is served, cut into bits, spread on paper-thin pancakes, rolled into a cylinder along with a bit of green vegetable and a thick brown sauce, and eaten from the hand like a sandwich; and whenever he sits down to fish he will compare it, unfavorably, with the fish of China, boiled in wine, blanketed with gravy sauce, salt and tart and sweet, and flavored with fresh ginger.

Ivory Auction Draws Dealers to London

Every three months London holds a great ivory auction in Mincing lane. Tusks of elephant, hippo and wild boar are put on view and cover several acres, popularly known as "the ivory floor." The walrus and narwhal also contribute. At an auction held recently some forty tons of this valuable article of commerce resulted in brisk bidding.

The ivory handled in this London market arrives from various parts of Africa. It is said that elephants, living in herds, elect when possible to die in a community cemetery.

People who know an elephant's tusks only as they appear on the living animals are invariably surprised at the great length of the tusks displayed for sale. It is explained that nearly half of the tusk is carried inside.

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play, which is a big hit, Wally Shine, official photographer, learns something of the jealousy existing in the company. The company prepares to depart.

They stopped at the steps and Joe Tracy made his good-bys. He was going camping in the woods with his friend Jimmy Travers, who was to meet him at Bangor tonight. They'd stay there twenty-four hours getting their stuff together, then be off for the northern solitudes—no beaten tracks for them. He left, jauntily swinging his kilted skirts, a whistled tune on his lips. Soon after, Stokes departed, saying he was going to change his clothes.

A door to the right opened into the entrance hall. Here he and his wife occupied a ground-floor room. He listened at the panel before he entered, then softly turned the knob, and, inside, as softly closed the door. Shut in and alone his languid pose fell from him like a cloak. An avid eagerness sharpened his features and directed his hands, pulling open his valise and taking from it a small leather case. Moving back from the window he pushed up his sleeve, took the hypodermic from the case and pressed in the needle. When he had restored the bag to its place, he threw himself on the bed and lay with closed eyes feeling the ineffable comfort, grateful as an influx of life, vitalize and soothe his tortured being.

Mrs. Cornell and Shine rose up and followed him. Mrs. Cornell had her packing to get through and wanted Miss Pinkney's help. Shine was going to see if the pantry would do for a dark room, intending to take some flashlight photographs of the company that evening. He had found in a cabinet all the flashlight requisites and thought it would be an interesitng memento of their visit—each of them to have a picture.

"They've got everything here," he said as he pointed to the corner where he had made his find. "Not alone all the supplies, but two first-class cameras and a projector. I suppose some of the family took it up for a fad."

Shine, who was domiciled in the butler's bedroom, disappeared into the adjoining pantry and Mrs. Cornell trod resolutely on into the kitchen, being one of the few members of the company who was not afraid of the housekeeper.

Miss Pinkney, who was sitting upright in a stiff-backed chair, rose respectfully. She was a lean slab-sided woman of fifty, with tight-drawn hair and a long horse face. She had disapproved bitterly of the intrusion of the actors upon the sacred precincts of Gull island and though she had been rigidly polite hoped that her disapproval had got across.

Mrs. Cornell broached her request and Miss Pinkney agreed. She was even very pleasant about it, showing a brisk, friendly alacrity—with the helper gone they'd only be a cold supper and she could dish that up in two shakes. Together they left the kitchen and on the stairs Mrs. Cornell hooked her plump arm inside Miss Pinkney's bony one and said when Mr. Shine took the flashlights that night he must take one of them as the "feeder" and the other as the "fed."

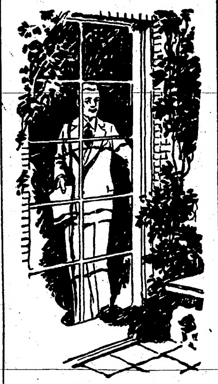
Bassett had gone into the house, too. As he crossed the living room he noticed its deserted quietude, in contrast to the noise and bustle that had possessed it an hour ago.

He opened the door into the hall, where again all was quiet, none of the jarring accents that occasionally rose from the Stokes' room. He walked across the gleaming parquette to the library which he had used for his office. Two long French windows framed a view of the channel and Hayworth dreaming among its elms. He went to one of the windows and looked out. The girls were still sitting there, and, as he looked at them, an expression of infinite tenderness lay like a light on his face. It was the light Shine had noticed, allowed to break through clearly now that no one was there to see.

He sat down at the desk; there were letters for him to answer, addenda of the performance to check up. He moved the papers, looked at them, pushed them away, and, resting his forehead on his hands, relinquished himself to a deep pervading happiness. Yesterday Anne had promised to marry him.

His mind, held all day to his work, now flew to her—memories of her face with the down-bent lids as he had asked her, and the look in her eyes as they met his. Brave beautiful eyes with her soul in them. It had been no light acceptance for her, it meant the surrendering of her whole being, her life given over to him. He heard her voice again, and his face sank into his hands, his heart trembling in the passion of its dedication to her service. Anne, whom he had coveted and yearned for and thought of far beyond his reach—his! He would be worthy of her, and he would take such care of her, gird her round with his two arms, a buckler against every ill that life might bring. She'd had such a hard time of it, struggling up by herself with Joe hung round her neck like a millstone.

At the memory of Joe he came to earth with a jarring impact. He dropped his hands and stared at the papers, his brows bent in harassed thought. Bassett had heard something that morning from Sybil which must be looked into—something he could hardly believe. But Joe being what he was, you never could tell. It had been a mistake to bring him, with Sybil a bunch of nerves and Stokes shunted unexpectedly into their midst. And now he felt responsible, he'd have it out with Joe before he left. One more disagreeable scene before they separated tomorrow, and Bassett, like Mrs. Cornell, felt he'd thank Providence when they were all on the train in the morning. Meanwhile he'd go over his papers while he waited for the boy, who had gone to his room to dress. The door was open and he could hear him as he came down the stairs.



He Went to One of the Windows and Looked Out.

Anne was approaching the house, a slender crimson figure, her hair in the sunset light shining like black lacquer. She was smiling to herself—everything was so beautiful, not only Gull island and this hour of tranquil glory, but the mere fact of existing. Then she saw Flora Stokes sitting on the balcony and realized that in this golden world there were people to whom life was a dark and troublous affair. She wanted to comfort Flora, let some of the happiness in her own heart spill over into that burdened one. But she knew no way of doing it, could only smile at the haggard face the woman lifted from her book.

"Oh, Mrs. Stokes, reading," she cried as she ran up the steps. "How can you read on such an evening as this?"

Flora Stokes said she had been walking about till she was tired, and then glanced at the distant rock:

"You've left Sybil out there."

There was no comfort or consolation that could penetrate Mrs. Stokes' obsession. Anne could only reassure:

"She's coming in soon. She just wanted to see the end of the sunset."

She passed into the hall, sorry—oh so sorry! But the library door was open and she halted, poised birdlike for one glance. The man at the desk had his back to her and she said nothing, yet he turned, gave a smothered sound and jumped up. She shut her eyes as she felt his arms go about her and his kisses on her hair, her senses blurred in a strange ineffably sweet confusion of timidity and delight.

"Darling," he breathed, when the kiss was over, "I thought you were never coming."

"I had to stay with Sybil. She didn't want to be alone."

"But you wanted to be here?"

"Just here," she laid a finger on his breast and broke into smothered, breathless laughter.

He laughed too and they drew apart, their hands sliding together and interlocking. It was all so new, so bewilderingly entrancing, that they did not know how to express it, the man staring wonder-struck, the girl, with her quivering laughter that was close to tears, looking this way and that, not knowing where to look.

"I ought to go," she whispered. "They'll be coming," but made no move.

"Wait till they do." Then with a sudden practical facing of realities, "When will we be married?"

"Oh, not for ages! I'm not used to being engaged yet!"

"I am—I never was before but I must have had a talent for it, I've taken to it so well."

"Oh, Hugh!" Her laughter came more naturally, his with it. They were like a pair of children, delighting in a little secret. "Won't they be surprised when they hear? Nobody has a suspicion of it."

She looked so enchanting with her eyebrows arched in mischievous query that he made a movement to clasp her again, and then came the creak of an opening door from the floor above.

"Hist!" she held up a warning hand and slid away, her face, glancing back for a last look, beautiful in its radiant joy.

Bassett moved to the stair-foot. Once again he had to come down to earth with a bump. He passed his hand over his face as if to wipe off an expression incompatible with disagreeable interviews. This must be Joe.

It was Joe, dressed for travel in knickerbockers and a Norfolk jacket, a golf cap on the back of his head. He carried an overcoat across his arm, in his hand a suitcase and a fishing rod done up in a canvas case. At the sight of Bassett he halted, and the elder man noticed a change in his expression, a quick focusing to attention.

"Oh," he said. "Want to see me, Bassett?"

"Yes, I want to speak to you before you go."

Joe descended. Stopping a step above Bassett, he set down his baggage and leaned on the banister, politely waiting.

Bassett spoke with lowered voice:

"I heard something this morning that I can hardly believe—an accusation against you. That you've been using your position here to act as one of the police spies who've been keeping tab on Sybil."

The boy looked at him with impenetrable eyes and answered in the same lowered key:

"Who told you that?"

"She did. She accuses you of having come here with that intention, got the job knowing that no outsiders were to be allowed on the island."

Bassett was certain he had paled under the tan, but his face retained a masklike passivity.

"Sounds as if she might be losing her mind."

"You deny it?"

The boy gave a scornful shrug:

"Of course I deny it. I shouldn't think it would be necessary to ask that."

"She says she came upon you examining a letter of hers, holding it up to the light. And three days ago she found you in her room looking over the papers in her desk."

"Ah!" he made a gesture of angry contempt. "It would make a person sick—examining her letters! I was looking through the mail bag to see if there was anything for me. If I took up one of hers by mistake does that prove I was examining it?"

"How about the other thing?"

"Being in her room? Yes, I was there. I went in to get a stamp. I had an important letter to go when Gabriel took over the mail and it was time for him. All the rest of you were out. Her room was next to mine and I went in. I never thought anything about it, no more than I would have thought about going into Anne's or yours or anybody else's. She's nutty, I tell you. You can't trust her word. And if she says I'm hired to spy on her she's a d—d—"

Mankind's Heavy Debt to the Humble Burro

The burro is a plodder, but he has done much toward development of America, especially in western states, asserts a writer in the Kansas City Times. He has carried timber, plaster and nails into the desert for houses, packed gold and silver and [illegible] men's lives.

Virtually every important ore deposit between Denver on the north and Guanajuato on the south, the Missouri river on the east and California on the west owes its discovery to the assistance given to man by the burro.

He has several characteristics that qualify him for a hard life. He can be driven, but not led. He knows a straight line is the shortest distance between two water holes, and he can find and follow that line in country he has never seen before. He can live on vegetation that a horse or mule or camel would not attempt to eat. He knows more about man than man knows about him; any prospector will admit this, declaring his own pet burro has more sense than any human partner he ever had.

A Fable

Peter Rabbit had slept a long time. Now his hair had grown so long that nobody knew him. He saw passing by an old, old man, weak and tottery, a younger-looking one with rheumy eyes and shaking legs, and another who looked a trifle less ancient.

"I am—eh-heh-heh!—Farmer Brown," said the first old man. "This is my son, Farmer Brown's boy, John, whom you may have seen, and here is his son, Farmer Brown's grandson, Demijohn, of whom you have never heard before."

And they went tottering down the hill, leaving Peter Rabbit considerably interested.—Kansas City Star.

Notice to Stockholders & Patrons of the Farmers' Co-operative Creamery Company of Holt, Minn.:

On March 31st, 1927, the Manager and the President of the Thief River Falls Co-Op. Creamery met with the board of directors of the Holt Creamery. This meeting was called for the purpose of selling our buttermilk to them. An agreement was made whereby they buy our buttermilk for one year, same to take effect about April 15th, 1927.

It is considered advisable and good business to sell your products where you get the best price and the most money, therefore it was unanimously agreed to dispose of our buttermilk for one year to the Thief River Falls Co-Op. Creamery.

We realize that there a few patrons that would like to buy buttermilk, some wanting only a can and others more. We further realize that creamery after creamery is going into the making of buttermilk powder. It is a known fact that for raising hogs, poultry, and turkeys on buttermilk, the farmer cannot come out on it when he has to compete with the prices you can get for buttermilk made into buttermilk powder.

Buttermilk for human consumption, in small lots, can be had now as heretofore, but the agreement calls for all the rest. The Board feel that they have acted wisely in this matter. They have agreed on something that will mean at least twice as much money for our buttermilk as we got before.

Board of Directors,
T. B. Folden, Sec'y.

TRUST COMPANIES RANK NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING HIGHEST

The outstanding trust institutions of the United States are those that were pioneers in using advertising as a means of selling their services, a speaker told a conference of trust companies held in New York recently. He presented the results of a questionnaire sent out by the Trust Company Division, American Bankers Association, making an inquiry into the advertising practices of institutions doing a trust business. Three out of every four trust companies and banks engaged in extending trust services were found to be advertising. The opinion was expressed by the speaker that their growth would closely follow the amounts spent each year for advertising.

The local newspaper is the most highly regarded advertising medium, it was disclosed. In all, 929 companies answering the questionnaire used the local papers and 338 did not. The institutions buying space in local papers are evenly divided among all sections of the country. Comparing six media for selling personal trust services and considering their effectiveness from the standpoint of producing results, the speaker declared that the local newspapers should head the list. Folders and booklets can reach a limited audience, he observed, but the newspaper is the best medium for acquiring prestige and mass circulation. It should never be omitted, he urged.

P. L. Anderon and Geo. Fricker made a business trip to Thief River Wednesday evening.

Alice Swan commenced her job as waitress at the Holt Cafe last week.

Dr. H. W. Froehlich of T. R. Falls made a professional call at the O. J. Backlund home on Monday.

"Stuck Week"

There are fifty-two weeks in a year, and almost every one of them has been named for something or other; but the Immortal Patrons of Sardonic Laughter must have picked out last week to be "Stuck Week." All the time, everywhere, somebody was buzzing around with their cars half-submerged. Of course there are only a few spots where it is so soft that you can't get thru, but we have been told that all that is necessary to make the road between here and Middle River perfect is to sprinkle on the cement—the mud is mixed.

SCHOOL NOTES

School began again on Tuesday after a ten-day Easter recess. The high school enrollment on that day was 100 per cent.

This week closes the fifth six-week period. In the remaining four days the final examinations for the period will be given.

The fifth and sixth graders have filled their bird chart with the names of the birds that have already returned from the warmer regions. They are now "getting acquainted" with each one.

The maps of the world have just arrived for the fifth and sixth grades from the publishers of Current Events. The fifth grade will use the map of the United States to help them in their review of this country.

The first and second grades have been studying music notes. They have learned the music notes of three rote songs. They have learned the songs previously.

The library-table of the first and second grade room is back into its place and use after the new finish which it received shortly before the Easter recess.

All the information that the writer can secure on the whereabouts of the Holt School faculty during the vacation period is that Miss Lano spent much of that time in Fargo visiting at the home of Miss Paulsrud. We believe that Miss Swenby spent the past week at her home in Chisholm, Minnesota, according to her statement. No one seems to know anything of the whereabouts of Mr. Palmer during the same period of time. He had the usual pleasant expression when he returned; yes, even at times it seemed to be unusual. Concluding from that, he too must have enjoyed himself. Miss Swenson visited at her home at Wolverton, Minnesota. All the teachers returned on Monday.

The eighth grade language class are working busily on their debate which will be given Friday. The question the class decided on is: Resolved, That Minnesota is a better state to live in than California. The seventh grade will judge the debate.

Each member of the seventh and eighth grade hygiene and sanitation class have been assigned different topics. Each pupil is required to place a diagram on the board illustrating his topic.

Your Kidneys
Must Function Properly For You to be Well

LATE hours, rich foods and stimulating drinks are all hard on our kidneys. If their action becomes sluggish, they do not thoroughly cleanse the blood of poisonous wastes.

Such impurities may make one dull, tired and achy, with often a toxic backache, drowsy headaches and dizziness. A common symptom of imperfect kidney function is scanty or burning excretions.

Thousands have learned the virtue of Doan's Pills, stimulant diuretic in these conditions. 50,000 users have publicly recommended Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

50,000 Users Endorse Doan's:

Lambert W. Cox, Westover, Md., says: "Doan's Pills proved their value to me. My kidneys acted sluggishly and the secretions were scant and scalding. There was such a soreness across my back that I couldn't bend or stoop. I was told to use Doan's Pills and shall always be glad that I did. They put me in fine shape."

The Leading Lady

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, Tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it.

He stopped. Bassett's eye was steady on him in a cold command he knew. There was the same cold quality in the director's voice:

"If the position Sybil's in has made her suspicious, that's all right. I'd like to believe it was the case. But if any of us—supposedly her friends—had inserted themselves in here to carry on police surveillance, using me to get them in—well, I'd not think that all right."

Joe leaned over the banister. His control was shaken, his voice hoarsely urgent:

"You got to be fair, Bassett, and because you're sorry for her is no reason to set her word over mine. It's not true. Don't you believe me?"

Bassett did not answer for a moment. He wanted to believe and he doubted; he thought of Joe's desire to come, of the reward:

"I guess you know, Joe, you can trust me to be fair, but I'm not going to commit myself till I know. It won't be hard to do that. I can find out when I get back to New York. And take this from me—if what Sybil says is true I'm done with you. No more help from me, no more work in any company I manage. And I fancy the whole theatrical profession will feel the same way." He drew back from the stair-foot. The disagreeable interview was over. "There's no good talking any more about it. Accusations and denials don't get us anywhere. We'll let it rest till I've made my inquiries. I'll say good-by now and hope you'll have a good time in the woods."

He turned and walked up the hall to his room on the garden front next the Stokes'. Joe gathered his luggage and went the opposite way, down the hall and into the big central apartment. At the entrance door he set down his luggage and as he bent over it a whispered stream of curses flowed from his lips. He cursed Bassett and his luck, but Sybil with a savage variety of epithet and choice of misfortune, for she had undone him. Straightening up, he looked blankly about—his inner turmoil was such he hardly knew where he was—and he retraced his steps, seeking the seclusion of his room, went up the stairs in noiseless vaulting strides like a frightened spider climbing to its web.

CHAPTER III

Anne had taken off her costume and slipped into a negligee to do her packing comfortably, and then decided she had better bid good-by to Joe first. She wanted to tell him her great secret, see an answering joy leap into his face, for he thought more of Bassett than anybody, and he'd be so surprised to hear that Anne, her charms held at a low valuation, had won such a prize.

She passed the long line of closed doors, voices coming from behind Mrs. Cornell's, and reaching Joe's knocked. A "come in," uninvitingly loud and harsh, answered her and she entered. Joe was sitting in a low armchair, bent forward, his hands holding a cane with which he was tapping the floor. He looked up to see who it was; then, without greeting or comment, drooped his head and went on lightly striking the cane on the carpet as if he were hammering in a nail and it required all his attention, then raised his head and looked at her—what have you come here for? the look said.

It was not a reception to encourage confidences and she stood uncomfortably regarding him, trying to find something to say that would dispel his somber ill humor.

"You're all ready? Where's your luggage?"

"Down by the door. Is there anything else you want to know?"

"I don't want to know, I was thinking of you. You're always late, and it's different here with only one way to get ashore and Gabriel never willing to wait."

He made no answer, continuing his play with the cane. She knew that something was wrong and sat down on the arm of a chair, uneasy, wondering what it was:

"I'm glad you've managed this holiday. And it's jolly having Tommy Travers, he's such a sport. You'll meet him tonight at Bangor. At the Algonquin Inn—wasn't that the name of it?"

"Um."

"I want to be sure, because if any important mail should come for you I could send it there to meet you on your way back. Algonquin Inn—I'll remember that. Then off tomorrow morning—it'll be lovely in the woods now."

"Any place would be lovely after this beastly hole."

"Beastly hole! I thought you liked it!"

"Did you? Take another guess."

"You expected to like it. You wanted to come."

He made no answer, but slanting his body sidewise with an air of ostentatious endurance, took out his watch and looked at it. She ignored the hint—you couldn't be sensitive with Joe—and leaning toward him asked:

"What's the matter, Joe?"

"Matter—with what?"

"You! Has anything happened?"

"Oh, no, nothing's happened." His words were mincingly soft. "What could happen with such a charming lot of people and Miss Saunders playing the star role in the performance and out?"

It was Sybil then—he'd been working himself into a bad temper over her treatment of him. Anne had thought it odd he had not mentioned it before:

"But I Got Teeth—I Can Bite."

"You're angry with Sybil, and I don't think she has been very nice to you. I've noticed it, especially the last three days and this afternoon when we were sitting out there on the rock I tried to make her tell me why."

He raised his head; the profile sharply defined against the window showed a working muscle in the cheek: "And did she tell you?"

"No, she didn't seem to want to talk about it. She changed the subject. There's no use getting annoyed about it, because I don't think she has any reason. You have to make excuses for her. She's gone through this awful experience and her nerves are all wracked to pieces. You have to be patient and take her as a sort of afflicted person—"

He dashed the cane down and jumped to his feet in a volcanic explosion of rage:

"I don't take her that way. I take her for what she is, a d—d lying hypocrite."

"Joe!" She was amazed, not so much at the words as at the suddenness of the outburst and the contorted passion of his face.

"She thinks she can treat me any way she wants and get away with it. Well, she'll find her mistake, she's taken the wrong turning this time. She takes me for a yellow dog she can kick whenever she feels like it. But I got teeth—I can bite. Patient—be patient— G—d, I'd like to wring her neck, the d—d—"

He used an epithet that brought Anne to her feet, breathing battle: "Don't dare to say that of my friend, Joe Tracy."

He stood in front of her, hump-shouldered, with outthrust jaw, brows drawn low over eyes gleaming like a cat's. She had never seen him look like that; he seemed a stranger, a horrible stranger, and she drew away, aghast at the revelation of a being so sinisterly unfamiliar. Her look brought him back to self-control. He jerked his head up, ran a hand over his hair, and turned away to the window. Standing there he said:

"Well, I take that back. I didn't mean to say it. But she's made me mad; I think she'd make anybody."

The tone, surly still, had a placating quality; it was as near an apology as Joe could ever come. She felt immeasurably relieved, for he had frightened her. She accepted his amends without comment, but she could not resist a sisterly admonition:

"If you'd only stop getting mad over small things you'd find life so much easier."

He laughed:

"Good advice from little sister! It doesn't cost anything and it's the correct ingenue pose."

He turned from the window smiling, Joe at his most amiable. If he had met her this way she would have poured out her secret. But her high mood had fallen and besides he wanted her to go—he said he had a letter to write yet. Lounging toward her he put his hands on her shoulders, gave her a light kiss on the cheek and pushed her toward the door.

On her way back along the gallery she recalled his face in that moment of rage with troubled question. She wondered if there was more disturbing him than she knew—it was an extraordinary exhibition of anger for such a cause. She heaved a sigh of relief at the thought that he was going. In his present mood there was no knowing what clashes there might be, and it was the last evening, and there would be a full moon, and she and Bassett would walk like lovers under its magic light.

When her door had closed, the gallery and living room became as quiet as though the house were unoccupied. Sybil, approaching it, heard no sound of voices, a fact that reassured her, for the long day had tired her and she had no mind for talk. She was coming in by the balcony when she saw Flora Stokes sitting there reading and deflected her course toward the path that skirted the building's front. If Flora noticed her she made no sign, her eyes glued to her book, and Sybil, stepping softly, for she dreaded the woman's resentful glances, passed along to the entrance of the living room. The place was deserted and she stopped on the threshold for a last look at the sky's fading splendors.

Across the depths of the room the door into the hall opened, but so gently that she did not hear it. Stokes made this noiseless entrance in the hope that she might be there, and now, seeing his hope fulfilled, closed the door as carefully, standing against it watching her.

Seeing that she did not turn he pronounced her name. At that she wheeled, lightning-quick, and came forward from beneath the deep jut of the gallery assuming as unconcerned a manner as she could.

"Lovely evening," she said as she advanced. "It's been hard to come in."

"Evidently from the length of time you stayed out there. I've been waiting for you."

It was not a propitious beginning, especially as he still stood against the door as if intending to bar her exit.

"I'm going upstairs to dress now."

"There's plenty of time. You can give me a few minutes. I've something I want to say to you."

"Oh, Aleck!" She stopped with an air of weary expostulation. "Don't say anything more. Don't begin that dreadful subject. I'm sick of it, I loathe it and can't you see it isn't any use?"

He went on as if he hadn't heard her:

"I've been trying for days, ever since I came here. And you keep avoiding me, always having some one with you. Now we'll be going tomorrow, we may not have another chance, and I must see you and tell you"—he stopped and looked at the gallery. "Did I hear a step up there?"

Lure of City Holds Even Poorest People

The hopelessness of efforts to induce people to move from the crowded cities to the serenity and beauty of the country, according to the Lincoln Journal, was brought home to a Londoner who was asked for a copper by a hobbling old man. When he asked why he did not live in the country, where his old age pension of ten shillings a week would go much further than in the city, the old fellow was ready with his reason. "I should be miserable there," he said, "without the refinements of London life." When pressed for particulars he said that these were the music in the parks and the benefit of the public libraries. He was very fond of the British museum. George Bernard Shaw was his favorite author. And there you are. It reminded the hearer of the old people in a Shoreditch almshouse who didn't want to be sent to the country. They liked London and didn't want to be kept awake by the nightingales. One of them liked best of all sounds the clip, clop, clip, clop and the jingle bells on the hansom cabs. What is the humanitarian to do with people who are as human as that?

Bringing Dolly Home

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

"IT WAS your idea, sending George to a co-educational college," observed Mrs. Gordon, still letting her gaze linger on the telegram. "Well, I don't think all the men at Welton university do that sort of thing. Just read that telegram over—will you?"

Laura Gordon, their eighteen-year-old daughter, reached for the telegram which she had not yet seen and did the rereading for her mother. "That's just what it says. 'Bringing Dolly Drum home for Easter holidays. Will arrive at 7 a. m., Thursday morning. Tell Laura to get up a dance.'"

"But they're taking a night train from Welton," said Mrs. Gordon. "Of course, they save time that way—but I can't imagine what Dolly's mother is thinking of."

"Maybe Dolly's mother doesn't know," suggested Mr. Gordon. "Anyway, I guess Dolly can look after herself."

Laura was too much engaged getting up the dance for the Monday after Easter to think much about Dolly. She arranged to have twelve girls and twelve men—since of course she would not have to provide a girl for George. Besides, thought Laura, she didn't want to invite every Tom, Dick and Harry. She invited only the boys who, she knew, would come in evening dress.

More curious than she realized as to the personality of George's new "girl friend," Laura volunteered to motor over to the station to meet the seven o'clock train Thursday morning.

The first person off the express train was George and then followed a very broad, very tall young man who made six-foot George seem half grown.

Laura rushed forward, received her brother's rough embrace and was about to ask, "Where's Dolly?" when her brother presented his companion. "This is my friend, Mr. John Drum," he said, adding proudly, "John Dollymore Drum. Dolly, this is my sister."

"But where is Dolly?" asked Laura weakly, and then George explained. Of course he thought they'd know at home that Dolly was a man. Hadn't they heard of Dolly—the great Dolly—Dolly, the famous quarterback? Laura tried to make George and his companion believe that she knew him by reputation.

Interested as the Gordons were in their son's intimacy with the noted quarterback—of whom they had inadvertently never heard—there was a perceptible tone of disappointment in their welcome.

Laura, feeling that her brother's friend must be aware of this disappointment, tried to make amends. She talked with him and walked with him, sang for him and made candy for him until Dolly felt convinced that the whole world did not contain another girl so lovely and bewitching as Laura.

George looked forward eagerly to the dance and the pride he would feel in introducing his friend, the famous quarterback, Mr. John Dollymore Drum.

Monday morning Dolly followed Laura about the house as she garnered it for the great event and finally he had courage enough to tell her that he didn't think he would be present. For one thing he didn't dance and for another he had no evening clothes. All he did was play football and study at college. His father had no money to pay for such luxuries as tuxedos. Laura suggested that he rent a tuxedo for the occasion, but Dolly was sure that there would be none large enough for rent. She could teach him to dance that afternoon—and they could make some excuse about the clothes, she said.

Dolly smiled at Laura a wistful, happy smile that made her blush. He'd like to have her teach him to dance that afternoon—but he'd tell the truth about the clothes. Thereupon Laura laid down her duster and set the phonograph going, held out her slender young arms to Dolly and gave him his first lesson. Laura had much to do that afternoon—but always when there were a few minutes to spare she would call Dolly, who always seemed to be somewhere at hand, and give him one more lesson.

That evening Dolly stood the ordeal of being the only man present not clad in some sort of evening attire. The party went along amazingly well. That is, until it was time for the guests to depart. Someone wanted to say good-night to Laura, but Laura was not to be found. Neither was Dolly Drum. They were still missing when everyone had gone and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon and George stood perplexed in the dining room wondering whether they'd clear things away then or leave them till morning—wondering, more than they liked to say, what had become of Laura and Dolly.

But Dolly and Laura quietly walked in from the kitchen. They had been on a little walk, they said, and didn't realize how long they had been gone. Dolly looked down at Laura and Laura threw back an understanding glance.

"Yes, let's tell them," she said. And then, turning to George and her parents, she announced: "We're engaged. We couldn't help it."

"Well, I'm blessed," was what Mr. Gordon said, and then he reflected to himself that the Easter holidays had not been without some sort of thrill after all.

Tinting Tips
(Copyright 1927)

Here's the secret of giving lingerie, stockings, etc., the most gorgeous tints. All tints are really colors. So use real dyes. Get an envelope of the actual dye powder at any drug store, for fifteen cents. Do your own diluting, which saves money and gives you the exact shade you want.

Diamond dyes do perfectly beautiful tinting—in cold water. A dip, and it's done. And true dyes don't streak! Dye-tinting doesn't look weak, however delicate a tone you use; nor does it wash out unevenly. When you want the tint to be permanent, just use boiling water instead of cold!

Regular dyeing of all dress materials, drapes, etc., just as easy. Ask druggist for color cards and suggestions. Or, a wealth of ideas in full colors, in new book Color Craft free and postpaid; write DIAMOND DYES, Dept. N30, Burlington, Vermont.

Great Northern Introduces New Design Day Coach

The Great Northern Railway has scored with another innovation in passenger train service, a de luxe extra large passenger coach sumptuously decorated to harmonize with the pastel green shade treatment of the company's crack train "The New Oriental Limited". Outwardly these steel clad cars resemble the ordinary passenger coach but it is their interior arrangement, furnishings and decoration that are new. When the Pullman Company took over the Great Northern's sleeping car service the company was left with a supply of first class steel sleeping cars for which it had no immediate use. These were rebuilt into these de luxe new type day coaches for service on the new Oriental Limited. The interior was first tinted in pastel shades of green, then the seats were deeply upholstered in complimentary shades. At one end of the car is a large smoking and club room which has been unchanged from its sleeping car days, for the use of male passengers while the other end is occupied by a commodious ladies' dressing room. These cars have proven decidedly popular among the Oriental Limited's day coach patrons and supply a luxurious service new to day coach travelers anywhere.

A simple test that proves the economy of good paint. A given quantity of good paint covers 25% to 50% more surface than the same quantity of poor paint.

Good Paint Costs Less!

IT'S a fact—good paint actually costs you less to use than poor paint. A low price per gallon on poor paint is deceiving because it takes more gallons to cover a given surface and then you haven't got a job that will protect as well or last as long as good paint.

For You to be Well

LATE hours, rich foods and stimulating drinks are all hard on our kidneys. If their action becomes sluggish, they do not thoroughly cleanse the blood of poisonous wastes.

Such impurities may make one dull, tired and achy, with often a toxic backache, drowsy headaches and dizziness. A common symptom of imperfect kidney function is scanty or burning excretions.

Thousands have learned the virtue of Doan's Pills, stimulant diuretic in these conditions. 50,000 users have publicly recommended Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

50,000 Users Endorse Doan's:
Lambert W. Cox, Westover, Md., says: "Doan's Pills proved their value to me. My kidneys acted sluggishly and the secretions were scant and scalding. There was such a soreness across my back that I couldn't bend or stoop. I was told to use Doan's Pills and shall always be glad that I did. They put me in fine shape."

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, Tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it.

He stopped. Bassett's eye was steady on him in a cold command he knew. There was the same cold quality in the director's voice:

"If the position Sybil's in has made her suspicious, that's all right. I'd like to believe it was the case. But if any of us—supposedly her friends—had inserted themselves in here to carry on police surveillance, using me to get them in—well, I'd not think that all right."

Joe leaned over the banister. His control was shaken, his voice hoarsely urgent:

"You got to be fair, Bassett, and because you're sorry for her is no reason to set her word over mine. It's not true. Don't you believe me?"

Bassett did not answer for a moment. He wanted to believe and he doubted; he thought of Joe's desire to come, of the reward:

"I guess you know, Joe, you can trust me to be fair, but I'm not going to commit myself till I know. It won't be hard to do that. I can find out when I get back to New York. And take this from me—if what Sybil says is true I'm done with you. No more help from me, no more work in any company I manage. And I fancy the whole theatrical profession will feel the same way." He drew back from the stair-foot. The disagreeable interview was over. "There's no good talking any more about it. Accusations and denials don't get us anywhere. We'll let it rest till I've made my inquiries. I'll say good-by now and hope you'll have a good time in the woods."

He turned and walked up the hall to his room on the garden front next the Stokes'. Joe gathered his luggage and went the opposite way, down the hall and into the big central apartment. At the entrance door he set down his luggage and as he bent over it a whispered stream of curses flowed from his lips. He cursed Bassett and his luck, but Sybil with a savage variety of epithet and choice of misfortune, for she had undone him. Straightening up, he looked blankly about—his inner turmoil was such he hardly knew where he was—and he retraced his steps, seeking the seclusion of his room, went up the stairs in noiseless vaulting strides like a frightened spider climbing to its web.

CHAPTER III

Anne had taken off her costume and slipped into a negligee to do her packing comfortably, and then decided she had better bid good-by to Joe first. She wanted to tell him her great secret, see an answering joy leap into his face, for he thought more of Bassett than anybody, and he'd be so surprised to hear that Anne, her charms held at a low valuation, had won such a prize.

She passed the long line of closed doors, voices coming from behind Mrs. Cornell's, and reaching Joe's knocked. A "come in," uninvitingly loud and harsh, answered her and she entered. Joe was sitting in a low armchair, bent forward, his hands holding a cane with which he was tapping the floor. He looked up to see who it was; then, without greeting or comment, drooped his head and went on lightly striking the cane on the carpet as if he were hammering in a nail and it required all his attention, then raised his head and looked at her—what have you come here for? the look said.

It was not a reception to encourage confidences and she stood uncomfortably regarding him, trying to find something to say that would dispel his somber ill humor.

"You're all ready? Where's your luggage?"

"Down by the door. Is there anything else you want to know?"

"I don't want to know, I was thinking of you. You're always late, and it's different here with only one way to get ashore and Gabriel never willing to wait."

He made no answer, continuing his play with the cane. She knew that something was wrong and sat down on the arm of a chair, uneasy, wondering what it was:

"I'm glad you've managed this holiday. And it's jolly having Tommy Travers, he's such a sport. You'll meet him tonight at Bangor. At the Algonquin inn—wasn't that the name of it?"

"Um."

"I want to be sure, because if any important mail should come for you I could send it there to meet you on your way back. Algonquin inn—I'll remember that. Then off tomorrow morning—it'll be lovely in the woods now."

"Any place would be lovely after this beastly hole."

"Beastly hole! I thought you liked it!"

"Did you? Take another guess."

"You expected to like it. You wanted to come."

He made no answer, but slanting his body sidewise with an air of ostentatious endurance, took out his watch and looked at it. She ignored the hint—you couldn't be sensitive with Joe—and leaning toward him asked:

"What's the matter, Joe?"

"Matter—with what?"

"You! Has anything happened?"

"Oh, no, nothing's happened." His words were mincingly soft. "What could happen with such a charming lot of people and Miss Saunders playing the star role in the performance and out?"

It was Sybil then—he'd been working himself into a bad temper over her treatment of him. Anne had thought it odd he had not mentioned it before:

"But I Got Teeth—I Can Bite."

"You're angry with Sybil, and I don't think she has been very nice to you. I've noticed it, especially the last three days and this afternoon when we were sitting out there on the rock I tried to make her tell me why."

He raised his head; the profile sharply defined against the window showed a working muscle in the cheek: "And did she tell you?"

"No, she didn't seem to want to talk about it. She changed the subject. There's no use getting annoyed about it, because I don't think she has any reason. You have to make excuses for her. She's gone through this awful experience and her nerves are all wracked to pieces. You have to be patient and take her as a sort of afflicted person—"

He dashed the cane down and jumped to his feet in a volcanic explosion of rage:

"I don't take her that way. I take her for what she is, a d—d lying hypocrite."

"Joe!" She was amazed, not so much at the words as at the suddenness of the outburst and the contorted passion of his face.

"She thinks she can treat me any way she wants and get away with it. Well, she'll find her mistake, she's taken the wrong turning this time. She takes me for a yellow dog she can kick whenever she feels like it. But I got teeth—I can bite. Patient—be patient— G—d, I'd like to wring her neck, the d—d—"

He used an epithet that brought Anne to her feet, breathing battle: "Don't dare to say that of my friend, Joe Tracy."

He stood in front of her, hump-shouldered, with outthrust jaw, brows drawn low over eyes gleaming like a cat's. She had never seen him look like that; he seemed a stranger, a horrible stranger, and she drew away, aghast at the revelation of a being so sinisterly unfamiliar. Her look brought him back to self-control. He jerked his head up, ran a hand over his hair, and turned away to the window. Standing there he said:

"Well, I take that back. I didn't mean to say it. But she's made me mad; I think she'd make anybody."

The tone, surly still, had a placating quality; it was as near an apology as Joe could ever come. She felt immeasurably relieved, for he had frightened her. She accepted his amends without comment, but she could not resist a sisterly admonition:

"If you'd only stop getting mad over small things you'd find life so much easier."

He laughed:

"Good advice from little sister! It doesn't cost anything and it's the correct ingenue pose."

He turned from the window smiling, Joe at his most amiable. If he had met her this way she would have poured out her secret. But her high mood had fallen and besides he wanted her to go—he said he had a letter to write yet. Lounging toward her he put his hands on her shoulders, gave her a light kiss on the cheek and pushed her toward the door.

On her way back along the gallery she recalled his face in that moment of rage with troubled question. She wondered if there was more disturbing him than she knew—it was an extraordinary exhibition of anger for such a cause. She heaved a sigh of relief at the thought that he was going. In his present mood there was no knowing what clashes there might be, and it was the last evening, and there would be a full moon, and she and Bassett would walk like lovers under its magic light.

When her door had closed, the gallery and living room became as quiet as though the house were unoccupied. Sybil, approaching it, heard no sound of voices, a fact that reassured her, for the long day had tired her and she had no mind for talk. She was coming in by the balcony when she saw Flora Stokes sitting there reading and deflected her course toward the path that skirted the building's front. If Flora noticed her she made no sign, her eyes glued to her book, and Sybil, stepping softly, for she dreaded the woman's resentful glances, passed along to the entrance of the living room. The place was deserted and she stopped on the threshold for a last look at the sky's fading splendors.

Across the depths of the room the door into the hall opened, but so gently that she did not hear it. Stokes made this noiseless entrance in the hope that she might be there, and now, seeing his hope fulfilled, closed the door as carefully, standing against it watching her.

Seeing that she did not turn he pronounced her name. At that she wheeled, lightning-quick, and came forward from beneath the deep jut of the gallery assuming as unconcerned a manner as she could.

"Lovely evening," she said as she advanced. "It's been hard to come in."

"Evidently from the length of time you stayed out there. I've been waiting for you."

It was not a propitious beginning, especially as he still stood against the door as if intending to bar her exit.

"I'm going upstairs to dress now."

"There's plenty of time. You can give me a few minutes. I've something I want to say to you."

"Oh, Aleck!" She stopped with an air of weary expostulation. "Don't say anything more. Don't begin that dreadful subject. I'm sick of it, I loathe it and can't you see it isn't any use?"

He went on as if he hadn't heard her:

"I've been trying for days, ever since I came here. And you keep avoiding me, always having some one with you. Now we'll be going tomorrow, we may not have another chance, and I must see you and tell you"—he stopped and looked at the gallery. "Did I hear a step up there?"

Lure of City Holds Even Poorest People

The hopelessness of efforts to induce people to move from the crowded cities to the serenity and beauty of the country, according to the Lincoln Journal, was brought home to a Londoner who was asked for a copper by a hobbling old man. When he asked why he did not live in the country, where his old age pension of ten shillings a week would go much further than in the city, the old fellow was ready with his reason. "I should be miserable there," he said, "without the refinements of London life." When pressed for particulars he said that these were the music in the parks and the benefit of the public libraries. He was very fond of the British museum. George Bernard Shaw was his favorite author. And there you are. It reminded the hearer of the old people in a Shoreditch almshouse who didn't want to be sent to the country. They liked London and didn't want to be kept awake by the nightingales. One of them liked best of all sounds the clip, clop, clip, clop and the jingle bells on the hansom cabs. What is the humanitarian to do with people who are as human as that?

Bringing Dolly Home

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

"IT WAS your idea, sending George to a co-educational college," observed Mrs. Gordon, still letting her gaze linger on the telegram. "Well, I don't think all the men at Welton university do that sort of thing. Just read that telegram over—will you?"

Laura Gordon, their eighteen-year-old daughter, reached for the telegram which she had not yet seen and did the rereading for her mother. "That's just what it says. 'Bringing Dolly Drum home for Easter holidays. Will arrive at 7 a. m., Thursday morning. Tell Laura to get up a dance.'"

"But they're taking a night train from Welton," said Mrs. Gordon. "Of course, they save time that way—but I can't imagine what Dolly's mother is thinking of."

"Maybe Dolly's mother doesn't know," suggested Mr. Gordon. "Anyway, I guess Dolly can look after herself."

Laura was too much engaged getting up the dance for the Monday after Easter to think much about Dolly. She arranged to have twelve girls and twelve men—since of course she would not have to provide a girl for George. Besides, thought Laura, she didn't want to invite every Tom, Dick and Harry. She invited only the boys who, she knew, would come in evening dress.

More curious than she realized as to the personality of George's new "girl friend," Laura volunteered to motor over to the station to meet the seven o'clock train Thursday morning.

The first person off the express train was George and then followed a very broad, very tall young man who made six-foot George seem half grown.

Laura rushed forward, received her brother's rough embrace and was about to ask, "Where's Dolly?" when her brother presented his companion. "This is my friend, Mr. John Drum," he said, adding proudly, "John Dollymore Drum. Dolly, this is my sister."

"But where is Dolly?" asked Laura weakly, and then George explained. Of course he thought they'd know at home that Dolly was a man. Hadn't they heard of Dolly—the great Dolly—Dolly, the famous quarterback? Laura tried to make George and his companion believe that she knew him by reputation.

Interested as the Gordons were in their son's intimacy with the noted quarterback—of whom they had inadvertently never heard—there was a perceptible tone of disappointment in their welcome.

Laura, feeling that her brother's friend must be aware of this disappointment, tried to make amends. She talked with him and walked with him, sang for him and made candy for him until Dolly felt convinced that the whole world did not contain another girl so lovely and bewitching as Laura.

George looked forward eagerly to the dance and the pride he would feel in introducing his friend, the famous quarterback, Mr. John Dollymore Drum.

Monday morning Dolly followed Laura about the house as she garnered it for the great event and finally he had courage enough to tell her that he didn't think he would be present. For one thing he didn't dance and for another he had no evening clothes. All he did was play football and study at college. His father had no money to pay for such luxuries as tuxedos. Laura suggested that he rent a tuxedo for the occasion, but Dolly was sure that there would be none large enough for rent. She could teach him to dance that afternoon—and they could make some excuse about the clothes, she said.

Dolly smiled at Laura a wistful, happy smile that made her blush. He'd like to have her teach him to dance that afternoon—but he'd tell the truth about the clothes. Thereupon Laura laid down her duster and set the phonograph going, held out her slender young arms to Dolly and gave him his first lesson. Laura had much to do that afternoon—but always when there were a few minutes to spare she would call Dolly, who always seemed to be somewhere at hand, and give him one more lesson.

That evening Dolly stood the ordeal of being the only man present not clad in some sort of evening attire. The party went along amazingly well. That is, until it was time for the guests to depart. Someone wanted to say good-night to Laura, but Laura was not to be found. Neither was Dolly Drum. They were still missing when everyone had gone and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon and George stood perplexed in the dining room wondering whether they'd clear things away then or leave them till morning—wondering, more than they liked to say, what had become of Laura and Dolly.

But Dolly and Laura quietly walked in from the kitchen. They had been on a little walk, they said, and didn't realize how long they had been gone. Dolly looked down at Laura and Laura threw back an understanding glance.

"Yes, let's tell them," she said. And then, turning to George and her parents, she announced: "We're engaged. We couldn't help it."

"Well, I'm blessed," was what Mr. Gordon said, and then he reflected to himself that the Easter holidays had not been without some sort of thrill after all.

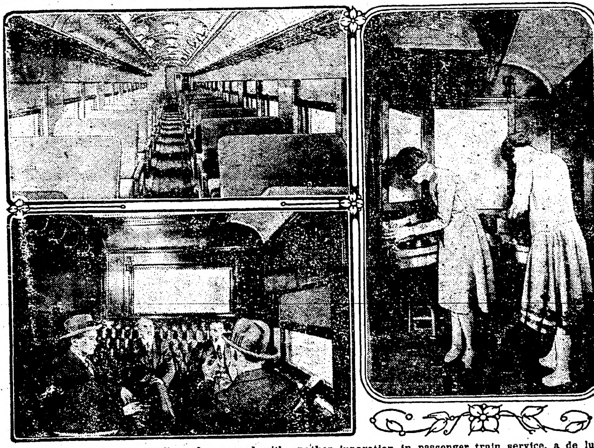
Great Northern Introduces New Design Day Coach



The Great Northern Railway has scored with another innovation in passenger train service, a de luxe extra large passenger coach sumptuously decorated to harmonize with the pastel green shade treatment of the company's crack train "The New Oriental Limited". Outwardly these steel clad cars resemble the ordinary passenger coach but it is their interior arrangement, furnishings and decoration that are new. When the Pullman Company took over the Great Northern's sleeping car service the company was left with a supply of first class steel sleeping cars for which it had no immediate use. These were rebuilt into these de luxe new type day coaches for service on the new Oriental Limited. The interior was first tinted in pastel shades of green, then the seats were deeply upholstered in complimentary shades. At one end of the car is a large smoking and club room which has been unchanged from its sleeping car days, for the use of male passengers while the other end is occupied by a commodious ladies' dressing room. These cars have proven decidedly popular among the Oriental Limited's day coach patrons and supply a luxurious service new to day coach travelers anywhere.

A simple test that proves the economy of good paint. A given quantity of good paint covers 25% to 50% more surface than the same quantity of poor paint.

Good Paint Costs Less!

IT'S a fact—good paint actually costs you less to use than poor paint. A low price per gallon on poor paint is deceiving because it takes more gallons to cover a given surface and then you haven't got a job that will protect as well or last as long as good paint.

SENATE KILLS THE CRIME BUREAU BILL

Department of Law Enforcement Linking Police Units Wins in Lower Branch

St. Paul—The senate rejected the provision of the bill passed by the house of representatives and creating a new department of law enforcement, with state bureaus of identification, investigation and record-keeping, and voted to go ahead with consideration of the senate's own plan for crime prevention, which provides merely for a statistical organization, supervised by the attorney general and without police powers of investigation.

St. Paul—Minnesota's crime prevention program was put up to the state senate when the house of representatives recorded its indorsement of principles laid down by the Minnesota crime commission.

The house voted by a big majority for important features of the plan to fight crime. By the house action, the issue is placed right before the senators as to whether adequate measures are to be taken to suppress crime.

Of front rank importance, a strong department of law enforcement, equipped to link up disorganized police units and furnish expert aid in tracing the modern criminal, was voted by the house with little opposition, only 27 votes being mustered against it, of the 27 voting no, 11 were from Minneapolis and St. Paul. Southern Minnesota members voted almost as a unit for the bill.

Crime bills as prepared by the crime prevention committee, which have been approved so far by the house include:

A full fledged department of law enforcement in charge of a commission, including bureaus of identification, investigation and records with a limited number of expert investigators to aid local police in tracing major crime, and with a full equipment for fingerprint and other records.

Flat requirement that all prisoners in state penal institutions must serve at least the minimum prescribed by law. Minimums mean nothing now, R. J. Quinlivan told the house, because a man can be released the day after he is admitted.

Five years as the absolute minimum to be served by a man convicted of a felony in which a gun or other dangerous weapon was used.

One year as the minimum where no other is prescribed by law. Revision of other terms to correspond, making first degree arson five years and other crimes on a par.

Birch Coulee To Be Park.

The scene of a battle between pioneer farmers of Renville county and Sioux Indians will be designated as Birch Coulee Battlefield State Park, under terms of a bill passed by the house and sent to the senate. As the senate finance committee has approved the bill calling for a small appropriation to acquire some land and establish the park, it is expected the park will be officially designated. It was at this place in Renville county that hastily recruited forces under General Sibley repulsed Chief Little Crow and his Indian troops in the Sioux outbreak.

Bills Ban Radio Election Day.

Candidates will not even be permitted to reach the voters by radio on election day, if the legislature passes one af a series of election bills just presented in both houses. The law already is stringent in prohibiting electioneering within 100 feet of polling places, but it must be brought up to date. So the proposed amendment says that it shall be unlawful to set up "telephone, phonograph or radio apparatus in such a manner that voters within 100 feet of the building may be solicited."

Tax Relief Measure is Signed

Relief for the delinquent tax situation, which has become extremely serious in some Minnesota counties, is promised in the passage of H. F. 496, the bill sponsored by several northern members in both houses, revamping the law as to tax sales and making several important changes. The bill was signed by governor Theodore Christianson.

It is hoped that the new law will result in restoring much land to the tax rolls. This will relieve taxpayers in districts where burdens have been made heavy by the failure to collect, on 25 or even 50 per cent of the land. The measure is classed as one of the important constructive accomplishments of the session.

The survey being conducted by the federal forest service in Minnesota has shown that in 25 northern counties more than 6,000,000 acres of land are tax delinquent, besides many town and city lots.

The house took up the bill changing the parole board organization and the proposed amendment by Sumner T. McKnight, taking institution heads off the board as provided in the senate bill; George W. Johnson of Duluth opposed any change in the present board, R. J. Quinlivan replying for the committee.

The house reconsidered and passed one bill, dealing with the responsibility of banks for collections, making the bank only the agent and responsible only for "due care," as now provided by contract rules.

Would Drop Farm Heritage

A bill to exempt from inheritance taxes up to 640 acres of land used for agricultural purposes is to receive final consideration by the Minnesota house of representatives and, if passed, its author, Representative John Lewer of Waseca, declares that it will furnish an added incentive to attract to Minnesota eastern capital for investment in farm lands.

The bill is a simple amendment to the present inheritance tax laws relating to exemptions. It provides that real estate owned by a decedent not exceeding 640 acres in area at the time of death, is being used wholly or partly for farming, stock raising, dairying or agricultural purposes, and whether operated personally by decedent or his agents or tenants, shall be exempt from inheritance taxation.

Bank Guaranty Bill Dead

Bank guaranty legislation was definitely sidetracked by the house. By a vote of 66 to 55 members refused adoption of a majority report from the committee of banks and banking recommending a bank guaranty bill for passage.

Immediately after it adopted the majority report of the committee recommending that the bill be returned to the author.

The conclusive action was an echo of the death knell sounded for bank guaranty proposals in the senate. Decision followed several hours of oratory in which speakers both for and against the guaranty principle heralded the issue as one of the most important before the present legislature.

HIGHLIGHTS ON LEGISLATURE

The house passed a bill forbidding officers of a bank from borrowing money from the bank.

* * *

The house virtually killed the bill calling for county assessors, when it failed to be included in a list of special orders on tax matters.

* * *

Resuming work on banking bills, the house passed the bill authorizing the commissioner of banks to assess stockholders of closed banks without court order.

* * *

The house committee on taxes killed bills increasing iron ore occupational and royalty taxes from 6 to 10 per cent, and dividing gross earnings taxes among municipalities according to valuation of railroad property.

* * *

An outside audit of the state treasury was recommended to the joint committee of the legislature considering that matter by C. D. O'Brien, Ramsey county attorney. Private investigations, Mr. O'Brien said, have convinced him that the audit should be made.

* * *

The senate committee on civil administration recommended for passage a bill, already passed by the house, which would increase salaries of all members of the legislature to $500 a session. Legislators now receive $1,000 for their session's work. They have received that pay for the last 20 years.

* * *

Reorganization of the board of parole, one of the major recommendations of the crime commission, was rejected in the house of representatives. The crime commission, in its report to the legislature, suggested abolition of the present board and the creation of a board of parole and punishment. This new group would have as it members a fulltime citizen chairman, to be appointed by the governor, a member of the state board of control, to be appointed by the governor, and the warden in charge of the candidate for parole.

* * *

Old time horsemen and businessmen submitted to the senate committee on state and county fairs their argument for passage of a bill creating a state horse racing commission as a method to promote breeding of finer horses, while opponents, who largely represented churches and church organizations, asked that the bill be killed because of the provision in it permitting pari-mutual betting at races. The bill has passed the house and now is before the senate committee for recommendation to the upper branch of the legislature.

MINNESOTA NEWS IN BRIEF

Northfield—The Odd Fellows' Silver Jubilee Home-Coming will be held at their home in Northfield, June 25th and 26th, when an elaborate program will be carried out for the entertainment of visitors from all parts of the state.

Owatonna — Minnesota legislators are urged to give "painstaking consideration" to measures strengthening criminal procedure in a resolution adopted here at a mass meeting called by the Southern Minnesota Crime Prevention association.

Minneapolis—In response to a petition signed by 60,000 citizens urging him to seek re-election, Mayor George E. Leach announced that he would be a candidate for a fourth consecutive term.

Minneapolis—With the annual convention of Rotary International, scheduled here as the outstanding feature of its kind in 1928, Minneapolis turned to the problem of caring for more than 60,000 other delegates who will come here in the next nine months to attend more than 51 state, national and regional annual meetings.

Chains Her Children to Keep Tab on Them

Modesto, Calif.—Mrs. Louise E. Lenzen is fighting to retain custody of seven children, three of whom were found by probation officers chained, tied and strapped in Mrs. Lenzen's ranch house at Patterson, near here.

"I tied them up because it was the only way I could keep track of them," she said.

The probation officers reported they found an eleven-year-old girl strapped to a bed, a three-year-old boy with his hands strapped behind his back, and another child tied to a chair in a sitting position, unable to move. Four other children, they said, showed signs of cruelty and malnutrition.

One of the children is an adopted daughter of Mrs. Lenzen's and the others are her grandchildren.

ALIMONY MARTYR 3 YEARS IN JAIL

Refuses to Contribute to His Former Wife's Support.

Willows, Calif.—Samuel W. Reid, California's "alimony martyr," who is serving a life sentence in jail rather than pay alimony to his divorced wife, has started the third year of his confinement.

Reid attracted nation-wide attention in 1925 when he declared he would go to jail before he would obey the injunction of Superior Judge C. F. Purkitt of Glenn county to pay alimony toward the support of his former wife, who, he insists, has now remarried her first husband.

"It isn't fair," he declared. "If he wants her he can support her. I'll not pay a cent toward her support if I lie in jail until I die."

Reid let his hair and beard grow long as a mark of resentment at the court's action. After sixteen months of imprisonment he was taken from the jail for a sanity test. A commission of alienists pronounced him perfectly sane. At that time he permitted his hair to be cut and his beard to be shaved.

After the examination, Judge Purkitt again ordered him to jail and Reid began to let his hair and beard grow again.

"I am a victim of injustice and personal spite," said Reid. "I am perfectly willing to pay for the support of our three-year-old child if she is put in the proper kind of a home. But no money for my ex-wife. Maybe my conduct seems peculiar, but it's the course I have chosen, and the course I propose to stick to."

Sheriff Roy Heard says the "martyr" is a model prisoner. Reid is a veteran of the World war, serving for eight months in France with the A. E. F. and receiving an honorable discharge in San Francisco.

Dog Balks Suicide Pact, Saves Lives of Owners

Vienna.—Their dog's antipathy to suicide, or at least to gas as a way of committing suicide, was responsible for the rescue alive of a Viennese accountant and his wife who attempted to asphyxiate themselves.

The accountant and his wife, discouraged by their troubles, closed the windows and doors of their apartment, opened all of the gas jets, and lay down on the bed to die in each other's arms.

By accident, or maybe because they wished that their dog should accompany them into the beyond, they had shut their dog up in the house with them.

The dog had different views. As soon as the gas became unpleasant he sought fresh air by jumping through the glass window pane.

Running to the porter the dog barked until the latter investigated.

The dog's master and mistress were resuscitated and now all three are again trying to make the best of life.

Boy Lost in Australia Chased by Wild Camels

Sydney, N. S. W.—Wandering away from a homestead on a cattle station in central Australia a ten-year-old boy, Harold Moran, was chased by a mob of wild camels, herds of which have bred and now roam about in these dry regions since they were displaced from their transport uses by motor trucks. Moran managed to escape the camels by diving under a fence. After three days he was found by worried searchers.

Girl Saves Train

Nashville, Ind.—Walking on the Illinois Central railroad tracks near here, Mary Brock, twelve years old, daughter of S. E. Brock, section foreman, found a broken rail. She flagged a fast morning passenger train with her apron. It stopped in time.

This modern age likes the mellow mildness of Camels

TRY Camels and you'll know why they win the modern world. Mildness and mellowness. The smoking wish of this exacting age is realized in Camels. Such taste and fragrance as never came before from a cigarette. A mellow mildness that can result only from superb blending of the choicest Turkish and Domestic tobaccos.

This age demands the best of everything—and it finds its ideal smoke in Camels. Nowhere else can you find such smoothness, such ever-dependable goodness as here—

Present Age Not One of Formality

William Lyon Phelps has a new name for this age.

"In 1927," he writes in Scribner's Magazine, "men are not yet able to wear doublet and hose, and while the newest dinner-jackets show some startling variations, the evening dress of gentlemen is fairly uniform. But the golf stockings that I am wearing at this blessed moment would have been hooted at in the streets in 1890. Women arrange their hair and their features in public; if a man of the nineties could suddenly wake up and find himself in a modern theater, the audience would afford a more arresting spectacle than the play.

"There is nothing immoral in all this; but it is certainly informal. This universal informality makes the manners and clothes of 1890 seem as remote as the Thirteenth century."

Pictures on the Clouds

Successful experiments in projecting pictures on the clouds, recently carried out at Jena, Germany, may result in the sky being used as a giant advertising board.

By means of this invention pictures may be thrown, giant-size, on the clouds, and during the recent experiments pictures came out with great clearness.

It is thought that in the near future it will be possible to show moving pictures in this way. But what would the proprietors of cinema theaters have to say about such an innovation?

Mr. R. D. Bagley toured 39 states with his band and made a host of friends everywhere. He retired from active life many years ago.

"For more than three years," he said recently, "I had to be very careful about my diet. I was troubled continuously with constipation.

"At times I had severe pains in my stomach and would tire very easily.

"It is really remarkable what Tanlac did for me. I took about 12 bottles at that time. Since then I feel all of 15 years younger. The stomach pains have not troubled me. I have plenty of pep and a good appetite—never miss a meal, in fact.

"Constipation doesn't bother me any more. I keep a bottle of Tanlac at home in case of need, and have never known anything that helped me so much. It does all that is claimed for it, and more. I have the greatest confidence in recommending it."

Tanlac is nature's own remedy, made from herbs, roots and barks, according to the famous Tanlac formula. HOW ABSTINENCE FROM ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS BY THE INDIVIDUAL BENEFITS THE COMMUNITY.

The papers in scientific temperance written by the different grades of the Holt School brought very pleasing results. Some very fine papers were contributed, showing time and labor had been spent in their preperation.

The local W. C. T. U. wish to thank each and every one who wrote on these topics.

The paper drawing 1st in the high school was such a fine paper we feel it is worthy of high comment.

How Abstinence from Alcoholic Liquors by the Individual Benefits the Community.

The problem of intemperance is becoming more and more serious as time passes; the evil results are becoming so obvious that it is considered a problem that is worthy of the most careful consideration. But, the seriousness of the problem is that so few of the people, especially the younger generation, realize the harm it is doing to them. It is the generation of today that will in future be the controlling power of our land some twenty five or thirty years hence. What if we do not try to teach them the harm of alcoholic liquors? What if we carelessly pass over the problem and do not present it in its worst aspects? Then, what may we expect of the future of our nation? We can not expect a thriving nation then if we allow this danger to continue. We can expect an indifferent, spendthrifty nation, lacking that vigorous loyalty to our country that our forefathers had, and that has raised our nation to the high level that it is on today.

Many people think, if they think about it at all, that alcoholic liquor is doing no harm to the nation as a whole, because they can see no definite way in which it has harmed the community in which they live. They may have a vague idea that it is harmful, but other than that they do not think about it. They may be even indulging in the habit themselves, not noticing any serious injury, but little by little the habit will grow upon them until they become immune to any feeling they may have had before that it was harmful, and seriousness will result, but then it may be too late. Such a person is decidedly a menace to the community. He cannot do anything but unskilled labor, he is squandering some of the nation's wealth and he is anything but a good example for the younger generation and a pride to the community.

Our modern living offers a good example why abstinence from alcoholic liquors benefits the community. Our methods of living are not as simple as they were in the days of our forefathers. We use complicated machinery in our factories and that fact alone calls for skilled and efficient workers. It calls for clear headed, steady handed persons. If every person working at these skilled positions were to begin the habit of drinking alcoholic liquors, the effect can readily be seen. They would soon be compelled to resort to labor that does not require efficiency and the general result would be the slowing down of our prosperity and welfare. On the other hand, a person who has not formed this habit, is capable of holding down a position that requires concentration and is a real credit to the community in which he lives.

Many experiments have been made in laboratories and elsewhere of the effect of alcoholic drinks upon labor and it has been shown that in memorizing, performing feats of skill, strength or endurance or doing fine mechanical work, the person who is under the influence of alcohol is more easily fatigued and does work much more poorly than a person who is not under alcoholic influences, no matter how small a dose of alcohol he has taken. If such a person could be made to realize the harm he is doing to his community, before it is too late, he would be a help instead of a detriment. He will not only be actually helping his community by giving to it his best and sanest efforts, but he will be contributing and setting an example for the future generation.

How shall we oppose the use of alcoholic drinks? The passing of regulation and laws against them will doubtless never conquer them, but we can do at least two things, abstain from them ourselves and tell the truth about them to others. We can also try to make our community so beautiful and happy and full of interest without this evil that the people will be drawn away from it by clean recreation and an interest in the prosperity of their community.

On the whole, in order to insure better development for our community, it might be a good policy to adopt a motto that would act as a kind of "danger sign" against the alcoholic evil—"Sobriety First!"

Sheriff J. P. Bordewich was here Friday attending to matters of business. While here had Leo Horien, owner of the Holt Dray Line go out with a number of teams and men to the A. Westfal farm to bring in about fifty sheep and a team of horses to be sold here in the near future.

America Leads Nations In Use Of Ice Cream

If any one food may be considered as America's national dish, it is ice cream.

Ice cream is a food particularly adapted to the needs of individuals of all ages, giving as it does the best type of nutrients for the repair of bone, teeth, blood and muscles and for energy.

Today thousands of housewives make their own ice cream. As a consequence, the making of this highly nutritious food at a reduced cost, yet without in any way impairing the product, is of importance.

Home economists have found a means to this end in the use of evaporated milk. There are three important reasons why evaporated milk makes the best ice cream, they point out. Because 60 per cent of the natural water in evaporated milk has been removed by evaporation, there is over twice the percentage of solids present in this type of milk than there is in ordinary market milk—and, since it is the solids that give ice cream its pleasing flavor, this fact is of moment.

Then, the composition of evaporated milk is constant, for the reason that it has been put through an homogenizing process, which breaks up the fat globules into tiny particles and distributes them evenly throughout the milk. This attribute makes for an ice-cream mixture of uniform quality and fine texture.

Finally, experts agree that the use of evaporated milk in ice cream contributes to its hygienic qualities, for the reason that evaporated milk is entirely sterile. Health authorities declare that milk and cream should be treated to a heat of 150 degrees F. for half an hour in order that a product may be produced free from infective organisms. Evaporated milk is processed at 240 degrees for 30 minutes, and, therefore, its introduction into an ice-cream mixture increases its purity in proportion to the amount of evaporated milk used.

Left-over butter must be saved for another meal, but how about the "left-over" butter-fat which your present separator leaves in the skim-milk? It isn't at all unusual for a new De Laval to increase the yield of butter-fat from the milk of just a few cows by a quarter to a pound or more a day. Think what this would mean to you in the course of a year.

Trade in your old separator

Your old separator—no matter what its make or condition—will be accepted as partial payment for the wonderful new De Laval which will make it possible for you to get this extra butter-fat.

The new De Laval is by far the finest separator ever made. It skims cleaner under all conditions of use, runs easier, lasts longer, and gives you a rich, smooth, high-testing cream. Let us show you.

HOW ABSTINENCE FROM ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS BY THE INDIVIDUAL BENEFITS THE COMMUNITY.

The papers in scientific temperance written by the different grades of the Holt School brought very pleasing results. Some very fine papers were contributed, showing time and labor had been spent in their preperation.

The local W. C. T. U. wish to thank each and every one who wrote on these topics.

The paper drawing 1st in the high school was such a fine paper we feel it is worthy of high comment.

How Abstinence from Alcoholic Liquors by the Individual Benefits the Community.

The problem of intemperance is becoming more and more serious as time passes; the evil results are becoming so obvious that it is considered a problem that is worthy of the most careful consideration. But, the seriousness of the problem is that so few of the people, especially the younger generation, realize the harm it is doing to them. It is the generation of today that will in future be the controlling power of our land some twenty five or thirty years hence. What if we do not try to teach them the harm of alcoholic liquors? What if we carelessly pass over the problem and do not present it in its worst aspects? Then, what may we expect of the future of our nation? We can not expect a thriving nation then if we allow this danger to continue. We can expect an indifferent, spendthrifty nation, lacking that vigorous loyalty to our country that our forefathers had, and that has raised our nation to the high level that it is on today.

Many people think, if they think about it at all, that alcoholic liquor is doing no harm to the nation as a whole, because they can see no definite way in which it has harmed the community in which they live. They may have a vague idea that it is harmful, but other than that they do not think about it. They may be even indulging in the habit themselves, not noticing any serious injury, but little by little the habit will grow upon them until they become immune to any feeling they may have had before that it was harmful, and seriousness will result, but then it may be too late. Such a person is decidedly a menace to the community. He cannot do anything but unskilled labor, he is squandering some of the nation's wealth and he is anything but a good example for the younger generation and a pride to the community.

Our modern living offers a good example why abstinence from alcoholic liquors benefits the community. Our methods of living are not as simple as they were in the days of our forefathers. We use complicated machinery in our factories and that fact alone calls for skilled and efficient workers. It calls for clear headed, steady handed persons. If every person working at these skilled positions were to begin the habit of drinking alcoholic liquors, the effect can readily be seen. They would soon be compelled to resort to labor that does not require efficiency and the general result would be the slowing down of our prosperity and welfare. On the other hand, a person who has not formed this habit, is capable of holding down a position that requires concentration and is a real credit to the community in which he lives.

Many experiments have been made in laboratories and elsewhere of the effect of alcoholic drinks upon labor and it has been shown that in memorizing, performing feats of skill, strength or endurance or doing fine mechanical work, the person who is under the influence of alcohol is more easily fatigued and does work much more poorly than a person who is not under alcoholic influences, no matter how small a dose of alcohol he has taken. If such a person could be made to realize the harm he is doing to his community, before it is too late, he would be a help instead of a detriment. He will not only be actually helping his community by giving to it his best and sanest efforts, but he will be contributing and setting an example for the future generation.

How shall we oppose the use of alcoholic drinks? The passing of regulations and laws against them will doubtless never conquer them, but we can do at least two things, abstain from them ourselves and tell the truth about them to others. We can also try to make our community so beautiful and happy and full of interest without this evil that the people will be drawn away from it by clean recreation and an interest in the prosperity of their community.

On the whole, in order to insure better development for our community, it might be a good policy to adopt a motto that would act as a kind of "danger sign" against the alcoholic evil—"Sobriety First!"

The LEADING LADY

by GERALDINE BONNER

COPYRIGHT by The BOBBS-MERRILL CO.

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull Island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, Tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it. Joe is arranging for a vacation trip. To Anne he betrays his enmity toward Sybil.

She had heard nothing and thought it odd that he should be so suddenly cautious. Discretion had been the last quality he had heretofore shown.

"I have avoided you and I'm going to continue doing it. Please move away from the door. It's silly to stand in front of it, for I can go round by the garden, but I'm tired and I don't want to."

He came forward, speaking as he advanced.

"This isn't what you think. I'm done with that. You've made me understand; you've gotten it across, Sybil. I'm not going to bother you any more with that subject you loathe and think so dreadful. But I can't help loving you and wanting to help you." She gave an exasperated gesture and made a move to pass him. As she did so, he said: "I've heard something of Jim Dallas. Just before I left town I met an actor who says he saw him."

"Are you telling the truth?"

"Why should I lie? What do I gain by it? I swore the fellow to secrecy and came up here to tell you and I've been trying—"

She broke in: "Was he sure? Where was it?"

The change in her manner would have crushed the hope in any man. Shunning him like a leper, she now drew close and laid her hand on his arm.

"I can't tell you here. It's too dangerous, too many people coming and going."

"It was Jim?"

"It was. It's quite a story, more than just seeing him. But we've got to get somewhere away from all these d—d doors—"

One of them opened—that into the hall behind them. They heard it and wheeled round, faces sharp-set in defensive interrogation. It was Flora Stokes, and Stokes, his senses more alert than the girl's, withdrew his arm from her clasp.

"Oh, Flora," he said, his voice supremely light and easy. "Were you looking for me?"

Mrs. Stokes said no, she had come to put her book back. She walked to a table and placed her book on a corner. The room was very still as she did this.

"It seems I've intruded," said Mrs. Stokes, each syllable meticulously clear and precise. "But if you want to be alone I should think you'd have chosen another place."

"Having chosen this is a pretty good proof we didn't want to be alone," retorted her husband.

She gave a light jeering sound of disbelief and walked to the entrance. On the sill she turned and looked at them with smoldering eyes.

"Don't be afraid I'll stay. I'm going for a walk on the front of the island. That's as far away as I can get; I'd go farther if I could."

She passed out of the door and Stokes turned to the girl:

"There—that's what I was afraid of. Some of the rest of them may come in at any minute. We've got to get out of here, some place outside."

"The Point—the summer-house. I'll go down there now—you follow me."

She ran to the entrance, he at her heels. Walking leisurely up the path to the summer-house was Shine. She threw out her hands with a distracted gesture and struck a foot on the floor in a frantic stamp. Stokes smothered an oath. "Tell me here," she implored, but he answered with an imperative shake of the head.

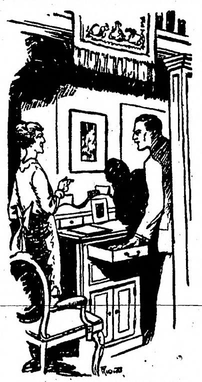
"The garden." She was half-way across the room before he caught her up, and this time it was he who laid his hand on her arm:

"Sybil, have some sense. You'll get us in wrong every way. You don't want any of these people to see us out there whispering together. That's just the place they'll go while they're waiting round for supper. Listen now, get a hold on yourself. Jim's safety is more important than your anxiety. That photographer chap's just strolling round killing time; he'll move on from there presently. Go up to your room and wait. You can see the Point from your window. If he's gone by seven, come down and go along to the summer-house. I'll watch, too, and I'll meet you there."

She opened her lips for a last protest, then, evidently seeing there was nothing else for it, gave out a groaning "All right" and left the room. He followed her, saw her mount the stairs, and walked out on the balcony. He could see the figure of his wife moving slowly toward the ocean bluffs. A newspaper lay on a table near him and he took it up, slumping down in his chair as one who relinquishes himself to a regained interest, but he did not read.

CHAPTER IV

Anne packed for a space, then gave it up. She couldn't go on with it, she wanted to be downstairs, not lose one minute of the last evening at Gull Island. Her spirits, oppressed by Joe's behavior, began to bubble again, foam up in sparkling effervescence. She slipped off her negligee and chose her most becoming dress, leaf-green crepe that made her look slim as a reed and turned her skin to ivory.



"You're Sure It Was Here?"

And she figured in front of the glass, studying her reflection this way and that, trying to see herself with new eyes and judge if she was a girl a man might be proud of.

While thus engaged she heard the chug-chug of the launch. It must be Joe going, and anxious to see the departure of that darkling and uncomfortable spirit she went to the window. Across the swift-sweeping current the boat came into view, skimming forward like a home-faring bird. Anne leaned over the sill, following it with startled eyes—where was Joe? There was Gabriel in front at the wheel, but in the back—she stretched her neck trying to see to the bottom of the cockpit, there certainly was no one on the seat.

"Oh, could he have missed it?" she groaned and cast up her eyes as if invoking the protection of heaven against such a calamity.

But he couldn't have, he wanted to go, it was his holiday and he thought Gull Island was a beastly hole. He must have been where she couldn't see him. It was difficult to think where this might be—but he might have been bending down to put something in his suitcase. A chair could have hidden him. She remembered what he had said about leaving his baggage at the living-room entrance. If it was still there then he had missed the boat and she ran downstairs, hoping with a prayerful earnestness that she would not find it. It was not there. "Then he is gone," she said to herself with a satisfied nod and drew a freer breath. The weight lifted, she went across to the garden, where she might find Bassett, and as she covered the space between the doors the picture of the launch rose on her inner vision with Gabriel the only visible occupant.

Bassett was not in the garden, but Shine was, sauntering into view from the balcony end. He'd been loafing about, he said, just come up from the Point. They strolled about on the lanes of turf between the massed colors of parterre and border, the air languishingly sweet with the scent of the closing flowers. Then they went in, luxuriously embedding themselves in two vast armchairs. Bassett found them here and tried to look genial at the sight of Shine.

They talked about the moon and moonlight effects. Shine wanted to take some photographs after supper, get the pines against the sea and the silvered bulk of the Point, and he spoke of his flashlight picture, which they'd have as a remembrance of Gull Island. Anne said that was a jolly idea, but she didn't think they'd need a picture to remind them of their stay, and she and Bassett exchanged a smile.

It was still on their lips when a sound came from outside, a single sharp detonation. It fell upon the evening's tranquil hush, sudden and startling, like something alien and unrelated.

"What was that?" said Anne.

"Sounds like a shot," Shine thought.

"It couldn't be!" Bassett got up. "Nobody has a pistol here and if he had he couldn't use it—one of the special stipulations Driscoll made when he lent us the place."

He moved to the land entrance and looked out.

The door of Mrs. Cornell's room opened on the gallery and Miss Pinkney emerged, Mrs. Cornell behind her.

"Mr. Bassett," she cried, a hand on the railing. "Where's Mr. Bassett?"

Bassett drew out from under the gallery and looked up at her:

"Did you hear that?"

"I did and I told you that Mr. Driscoll never allowed any shooting on the premises."

"Do you think that was a shot?"

"Well, what else was it?"

Mrs. Cornell, leaning comfortably on the railing, suggested that it might be an auto tire.

This drew a snort from Miss Pinkney:

"How'd a motor get here—swim or fly?" Then to Bassett: "Mr. Driscoll's very strict about that. He won't have the wild game or the gulls disturbed and—"

Bassett interrupted her:

"That's all right, Miss Pinkney. We were given those orders and we've obeyed them. And none of us could shoot here if he wanted to—there's not a pistol in the outfit. Don't you know it's against the law to carry one?"

"Then someone's taken mine," she exclaimed, and straightening up with an air of battle, "I'm coming down."

She left the gallery for the rear stairs, Mrs. Cornell in her wake.

"What does she mean—hers?" Anne asked.

"I don't know what she means," Bassett looked irritated. "It's the first I've heard of it."

"I don't see what there was to shoot at, anyhow," came from Shine. "Looked to me when I was out there as if all the gulls had gone to bed."

Miss Pinkney, entering, focused their attention.

"What's this about a pistol of yours?" Bassett asked.

She answered as she walked across the room to a desk under the gallery:

"It's the one Mr. Driscoll gave me, thinking it might be useful when I was here alone, opening or closing the house. I was to keep it loaded and have it handy, but I'd trust my tongue to get rid of any man and here it's lain with the poker chips." She pulled out a side drawer of the desk. "There!" she exclaimed, turning on them in gloomy triumph, "What did I tell you! It's gone."

Bassett looked into the drawer:

"You're sure it was here?"

"Didn't I see it this morning when I put away the counters you were playing with last night?"

"Umph!" Bassett banged the drawer shut in anger. "I'll see that this is explained to Mr. Driscoll. And whoever's taken it, they'll get what's coming to them. A d—d fool performance! To get us in wrong just as we were leaving—"

The hall door opened and Stokes entered.

"Who's shooting round here?" he said. "I thought it was taboo."

Jilted Girl Refuses to Wed Suitor, Jailed

Philadelphia.—Arrested on a warrant charging breach of promise, Bernard Laboube, a widower, thought a new proposal of marriage to Miss Antoinette Pimpinella, an orphan, would satisfy the girl. But it didn't.

"I am willing to marry her," said Laboube when arraigned before Magistrate Frank J. Clark at Norristown. "I want to provide a home for her."

Miss Pimpinella, a former telephone operator, testified Laboube cast her off after taking her to his home.

"I won't marry him," she said. "He was ugly to me, and I'm afraid of him. After he forced me to leave his home I wouldn't trust him."

LETS ROPE MANGLE HAND TO SAVE MAN

Inexperienced Climber Proves Himself Hero.

Cape Town, South Africa.—Mountaineers here are lavish in their praise of "a magnificent act of courage" performed by an inexperienced climber, John Byng, while attempting to establish a new route up the face of Table Mountain, in company with Frank Cooke of Cape Town.

The two men were linked together by a rope. After they had ascended 1,000 feet Cooke, an experienced mountaineer, fell, but was saved from certain death by the bravery and resource of his companion, who had no previous experience in climbing.

Byng seized the rope by which he was linked to his friend and slipped it over a rock. He then placed his hand between the rope and the rock so that it should act as a buffer and prevent the rope from fraying and snapping.

His hand was crushed and cut, but hour after hour he braved the pain and kept the rope in position. Cooke, who was suspended over a gorge hundreds of feet deep, was helpless, as his thigh had been broken by striking the cliff face.

By waving his handkerchief Byng drew the attention of a party of mountaineers, who went to the rescue. Reaching Byng, who was on the point of collapse, they relieved him of the rope and set about the business of recovering Cooke.

Two rescuers descended to him with food and restoratives. They blindfolded him to save him the mental torture of being suspended in midair. Twenty-four hours later he was hauled, more dead than alive, to the cliff's summit.

Prefers Jail and Love to Freedom All Alone

Los Angeles, Calif.—A prison term rather than promise that she would cease associating with the man who is asserted to have contributed to her downfall was the decision of Miss Florence K. Patton, thirty-four years of age, until recently a trusted escrow clerk in a downtown bank and a worker in church circles.

Miss Patton had admitted two counts of an embezzlement charge involving $3,150. Her shortages at the bank are said to have covered a period of several months and she is asserted to have used the money and her influence to further the financial ends of her suitor.

But when she was asked if she would give her sweetheart up if she was granted her liberty, probation officers told Judge Elliot Craig, she refused to answer the question.

So Judge Craig sentenced her "for the period prescribed by law," or one to ten years on one of the embezzlement counts and put her on probation for seven years on the other count.

Sundials Told Mayans of Passage of Time

Recent discoveries in the ruined Maya city of Copan have proved that the Mayas' method of counting the passage of time was of a highly accurate nature. The inhabitants of the city had in reality a form of gigantic sundial for obtaining the necessary data by taking observations from an eastern hilltop to a pillar of stone or stela erected on a prominent western hill approximately four and a half miles away across the valley in which lay the city. Clear evidence has been found that a correction was made at some date after the western stela had been set up, by the fact that the column was moved from its original position in the center of the stone base to another position farther north. The correction was made when the movable New Year's day fell on the same date as the commencement of the Maya agricultural year. In the first place the sun set directly behind the western stela on April 9 and September 2, but after the removal the dates were altered to April 5 and September 6.—Illustrated London News.

Funeral Fallacies

One fallacy which has not been dispelled is the belief that the carrying of a corpse over a public path establishes a "right of way." Quite recently it was reported that, at a funeral at Iffley, the coffin was taken across the Thames on a raft to avoid crossing the lock gates, which are private property, and thereby making them public for all time.—London Tit-Bits.

FACTS about
used car allowances

MOST new car sales now involve the trading-in of a buyer's used car. More and more people are asking: "Why should my used car seem to have several values? . . . Why should dealers in different makes of cars offer me allowances differing materially? . . . Does the largest allowance offered mean the best deal for me?"

Here are basic facts:

1 Your used car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.

2 Your used car has only one fundamental basis of value: what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.

3 The largest trade-in allowance which is offered on your used car is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; but sometimes it is not.

4 An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.

5 Judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your used car.

When you are ready to trade-in your present car, remember that after all you are making a purchase and not a sale. You are buying a new car and simply applying your present car as a credit toward the purchase price of the new car.

Progress Made in Caring for Sick

There are fifty more hospitals in this country now than there were a year ago, according to a statistical survey of hospitals recently completed by the American Medical association. The 6,946 hospitals now in operation in the United States have a capacity of 859,445 beds and the increase over last year is sufficient to take care of an increase in population of 5,000,000 people, association officials say. The growing importance of the hospital as an educational agency is indicated by the figures showing the number of hospitals that include nurses' training schools. The total number of schools comes to more than 2,000, of which Pennsylvania has the most in any state, though New York has the largest number of nurse students. There are slightly fewer than 28 registered nurses for every 10,000 people of the whole population of the country, the survey shows. The lowest supply is in Georgia and Mississippi, which have only seven for every 10,000 people.

Special note: People who want to reduce swollen or varicose veins should get a bottle of Emerald Oil at once. Applied night and morning as directed they will quickly notice an improvement which will continue until the veins and bunches are reduced to normal.

Takes Movies of Plants

The slowest motion pictures ever made are those of the United States Department of Agriculture which portray the growth of plants. This is done by the use of a "time-lapse" machine, invented by Howard Greene, that exposes only one frame of film at a time and regulates the time between such exposures. These periods usually are about 20 seconds, so that in an hour only about 180 pictures would be taken.

HABITUAL CRIME DRAWS LIFE TERM

Senate Enacts Commission's Bill to Bar 'Professionals' From State.

St. Paul—With only two opposing votes, the senate passed a bill that will permit life imprisonment for habitual criminals, a measure designed to make the state unattractive to gunmen and professional law breakers.

The bill was one of the group recommended by the Minnesota crime commission and is a modification of the Baumes law of New York, which is credited with reducing the number of serious crimes in that state since its operation. The measure already has passed the house and now will go to the governor for his signature.

The senate also passed two other measures on the crime prevention program. One of the bills requires that bondsmen in criminal cases file affidavits of their financial standing, a measure designed to check abuses of professional bondsmen, who have submitted bonds in many cases, without sufficient property to guarantee their payment. The other bill would extend the present practice of allowing prisoners time off for good behavior to persons imprisoned in the state reformatory at St. Cloud and the reformatory for women at Shakopee.

Would Aid Cheese-Making.

Approval of a movement to stimulate cheese-making in Minnesota to allow for greater dairy expansion was given by the house in voting to appropriate $21,000 to the Albert Lea State Experimental creamery for cheese-making. Representative M. J. Rohne of London, who sponsored the bill, said it would stimulate an industry greatly increasing the value of dairying to the state.

Governor Vetoes Pay Raise

Governor Theodore Christianson vetoed the bill increasing legislative salaries from $1,000 to $1,500, the executive refused to stand for the pay increase, and there is no chance of its being carried over his veto, as the bill commanded a bare majority in each house when passed. The governor sent the bill back to the house, where it originated, with a brief message giving his reasons. He declared that the state should not attempt to compensate members of the legislature in full for their time and effort. "Men do not go to the legislature for pay," said the governor, "but for opportunity to serve." Some boos and some applause greeted the message when it was read to the house. It was printed in the journal of the house, but no further action on it is expected.

The bill would have added $100,000 to the cost of each future legislative session, adding $500 to the salary of each of the 198 senators and representatives, and $1,000 to the lieutenant governor. It was to take effect in 1929, raising the pay of the present senate.

Senate Gets Horseracing Bill

The state senate will wrestle with the pari-mutuel horseracing betting bill, as a result of action by the committee on state and county fairs. The committee, by 7 to 4, voted to send the bill out "without recommendation," so it would have a chance on the floor, without indicating committee approval. The bill, which passed the house with only five votes to spare, has been fought hard by church representatives, as a measure to legalize gambling. It is promoted by racing interests, which want to bring running meets to Hamline and other Minnesota tracks. The bill would permit use of pari-mutuel betting machines at tracks where such races are run, and provides a system of state regulation of racing meets, on the order of the boxing commission.

House Votes Fishing Licenses

Fishing licenses will be necessary for residents of Minnesota, the house voted in approving the measure which it is expected will add about $250,000 annually to the state's income. As amended the bill provides: That residents 21 years of age or over must have individual licenses costing 50 cents each. That the head of a family may obtain a license good for all members regardless of age, costing $1. The fish and game commissioner must provide identification cards free of charge to all members of the family.

Letters went to national banks of Minnesota, asking them to sign petitions to the legislature in which they agree to pay bank taxes for the next two years on condition the legislature postpones revision of the tax system. The issue comes as a result of a Supreme Court decision in the case of the First National Bank of St. Paul, which upset existing schedules.

Cattle T. B. Bill Is Passed

The house voted for a $4,000,000 program to protect Minnesota dairy herds from tuberculosis. On a special order for appropriation bills, it directed a tax levy of $200,000 a year for the next five years, and have authority for issuing up to $3,000,000 in certificates of indebtedness. The money is to be spent for paying indemnities and the cost of making retests of dairy herds. The house laid over the educational appropriation bill for action later. Working on the semistate activities appropriation, it voted to cut out any support for the state immigration department for the next two years. The committee had eliminated the department's $12,500 a year. Representative Otto C. Neuman offered an amendment to give it $25,000 a year and pleaded for the need of advertising Minnesota, but the amendment was rejected.

HIGHLIGHTS ON LEGISLATURE

The house passed a soldiers' bonus bill carrying about $15,000 in small bonus claims.

* * *

Collection of motor vehicle license taxes would be brought under the control of the department of administration and finance if a bill as amended and passed in the house is enacted into law.

* * *

With only a few days remaining before the end of the session, the legislature found the bulk of important legislation still pending. Both the house and legislature faced a week of intensive activity during which the more important matters will be taken care of.

* * *

Country members fighting for part of the gasoline tax revenue face the problem also of getting a chance with their bill on the floor of the senate. The plan to turn onethird, or $2,000,000, into local roads was approved by the highways committee over objections of Senators Lewis Duemke and Charles E. Adams.

* * *

Consideration of the state forestry program, including six bills, was taken up by the house, and the first two bills were passed quickly. One sets aside 80,000 acres of state land within the limit of Minnesota National Forest, in Cass, Beltrami and Itasca counties, as state forest land. The second bill provides that all expenses incurred by the state in care of state forests shall be paid out of proceeds of sale of forest products.

* * *

The first step toward straightening out school appropriation difficulties was taken when Senator A. J. Rockne introduced two bills carrying out suggestions of Governor Theodore Christianson. It provides that all forms of aid shall be paid on a basis of 90 per cent of the full amount, and this shall be regarded as payment in full of the state's obligation. Aid for teachers' training and for high school tuition would be exempt from this provision.

Minnesota has a big forestry program, for reclamation of its vast cutover areas, in a series of six bills sent to Governor Theodore Christianson for his approval. The entire program worked out in the winter by the intensive study of the house and senate reforestation committees has been passed by both houses, with only minor amendments and the results surpass the expectation of the forestry experts who have co-operated in the work.

MINNESOTA NEWS IN BRIEF

St. Paul—A statewide commission to investigate causes of crime may be organized by the Minnesota Federation of Labor if plans discussed by the executive council in the Labor Temple are carried through.

St. Paul—Minnesota now ranks as the third tourist state in the union, on the basis of the number of automobile visitors entertained, being exceeded only by California and Florida, H. G. Hotaling, executive secretary for the Ten Thousand Lakes association announced.

Minneapolis—The Hastings dam site will be surveyed this year to pave the way for construction of the dam after July 1, 1928. Congressman Walter H. Newton said on his return from Washington. The dam will assure sufficient channel depth for the upper river barge line. Twin Cities business men will advance approximately $25,000 to finance the survey.

Minneapolis—Two one-time "buck" privates, now wearing the silver star of brigadier generals, participated in the exercises of dedication of the Veterans' hospital at Fort Snelling. One of them is General Frank T. Hines, director of the United States Veterans' bureau at Washington; the other is General John V. Clinnin, national commander of the Disabled American Veterans

For the Horsewoman

Very smart and correct are the regulation riding shirts of silk shirting in jacquard effects. These come in such colors as blue, violet, gold or green.

Shaded Costumes

Two or three shades of the same color are an interesting feature of smart French street frocks. Browns and beiges are especially lovely in rust.

This modern age discriminates—and smokes Camels

THIS age is the hardest to satisfy—it's the most discriminating age ever known. That's why it goes to Camel for cigarette enjoyment. It takes real tobacco to satisfy modern smokers and Camels are made of the choicest tobaccos grown, marvelously blended. Smokers of today are right in demanding Camels; no better cigarettes are made, regardless of price.

To seek a real smoke is to find Camel—the choice of the modern world. Camels are a revelation of goodness, always mellow, smooth and mild. This age shows the way to smoke contentment—"Have a Camel!"

Aged Aberdeen Lady Tells Experience

10 years of stomach trouble wrecked her health. Reduced to extreme weakness she tried Tanlac; enjoys strength and vigor at 73

Mrs. C. A. Warner lives at 502 S. First St., Aberdeen, S. D., happy and healthy. She told about the distressing illness which wrecked her health and of her rapid recovery. "For about ten years," she said, "nervous indigestion caused me a lot of misery. My nerves were on edge; my limbs and feet badly swollen. I was in dreadful pain, looked thin and worn, and looked no worse than I felt.

"The slightest exertion was a big effort to me then, and I tired easily. Nothing seemed to give me relief. Finally I tried Tanlac and from the very first bottle a marked improvement showed. The swelling vanished from limbs and feet, and the pain went, too. I am quite active now, my movements are brisk and free from pain. I took but five bottles of Tanlac and to these alone my complete recovery and present robust health are due. I give Tanlac full credit for all it has done."

Mrs. Warner is but one of the many thousands of women whom Tanlac has built up to rugged health and strength. If you are below par, get a trial bottle today. Tanlac is nature's own remedy, made from herbs, roots and barks. Your druggist has it. Over 52 million bottles already sold.

Druggist Gave Her Advice

Miss Ruth Horowitz, Bronx, N. Y., writes: "Having been troubled with indigestion caused by constipation for several months, my druggist advised me to try CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS. He said they are good for a hundred different ailments, if people only knew the value of them. I can safely say that since I am taking them, and only one each night, I feel like myself again and can eat most anything."

Those who suffer from sick headache, indigestion, biliousness tired-out and achey feeling, when due to constipation, will find relief in taking CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS.

Do You Feed Your Hogs Cream?

OF course you wouldn't do so knowingly—with butter-fat worth 40c. to 50c. a pound. Yet hundreds of thousands of people are feeding large amounts of cream in skim-milk to their hogs—because of inefficient separators.

Without a cent of expense you can tell whether your cream separator is skimming clean. Let us bring out a new De Laval and run your skim-milk through it. You may be surprised at the amount of cream recovered.

For 48 years, since Dr. De Laval invented the centrifugal separator, De Laval Separators have led the world in efficiency of work and popularity. The present De Laval is the best of all — it has the wonderful "floating" bowl — the greatest cream separator improvement in 25 years. It is guaranteed to skim cleaner. It also runs easier with milk going through the bowl and lasts longer.

Liberal trade allowances made on old separators.

MARSHALL-WELLS PAINTS
HOUSE PAINT

A simple test that proves the economy of good paint. A given quantity of good paint covers 25% to 50% more surface than the same quantity of poor paint.

Good Paint Costs Less!

IT'S a fact—good paint actually costs you less to use than poor paint. A low price per gallon on poor paint is deceiving because it takes more gallons to cover a given surface and then you haven't got a job that will protect as well or last as long as good paint.

We recommend

Marshall-Wells Paints

We believe they are the best paints made. We have confidence in the quality reputation of the makers. Furthermore, we know from the experience of some of our customers that they are the most economical and satisfactory paints to use. Drop in and let us give you some interesting facts about Paint.

This is the season of the year when it is necessary to give close attention to the proper cooling of the cream as soon as it has been separated, and to keep it cool until it is delivered at the creamery.

The most satisfactory way to cool the cream is to cool it in cold water. Stir the cream while cooling for a few minutes, using a stirring rod so as to get the animal heat out of it as quickly as possible. If the cream is stirred and cooled quickly it will be more likely to keep sweet until it is delivered at the creamery.

There is no better way of keeping the cream on the farm than to keep it in cold water. The colder the water, of course, the better the cream will keep.

There are other conditions that help to improve the quality of the cream. One of the most important is the keeping of all utensils, which includes milking machine, pails, strainers, cans and separator thoroughly clean. It is better to use a wire strainer than to strain through a cloth which soon becomes a source of off flavors in the cream unless the cloth is washed and boiled each time after it is used. The separator should be taken apart and washed twice daily. Washing powder and a brush should be used in washing all utensils, rinsing with boiling water. Then set them out in the sunlight.

Have the creamery furnish you with a supply of washing powder and brushes.

Be sure that you have a cream stirring rod to stir the cream while it is cooling and do not mix warm and cold cream together.

Another important matter that will help your buttermaker to make more high quality (93score) butter is to adjust your separator so that your cream will test between 30 and 35 per cent butterfat. There are really no advantages to you in separating thinner cream. The heavier cream will give you less cream to take care of and cool. It will keep sweet longer and it will not require as much vat room in the creamery. The buttermaker will be able to handle the cream to better advantage and make better quality butter when the tests are between 39 and 35 per cent than when you separate cream testing below 30 per cent butterfat.

The third important thing to remember is that the buttermaker must have the cream delivered at the creamery as early as possible in order to get the best results. Many creameries are placing all cream delivered late in the second grade, which is only fair because often a whole churning is scored off and the creamery gets a 92 score on that churning because the buttermaker had to hold the cream in the vat too long before all the cream was delivered at the creamery and he could start to pasteurize.

Once the cream is pasteurized no more cream can be added to the vat as that would spoil the whole churning. For this reason it is very important for you to cooperate with your buttermaker by bringing the cream to the creamery as early in the day as possible.

If it is necessary for you to bring your cream in too late you should be willing to take second grade for your cream in order that your neighbors who deliver their cream in the morning will not have to suffer a loss on a whole churning of butter which may be scored off because you failed to bring your cream to the creamery until in the afternoon.

Talk these things over with me. Your cooperation in the care and handling and the delivering of the cream at the creamery in the best possible condition will mean better returns and greater success to your creamery in making a larger percentage of high quality butter than will otherwise be possible.

Yours, for the best success of your creamery.

Submitted by P. L. Anderson.

The seventh grade language class are reviewing the parts of speech. Correct usage of the different forms obtained by composition Work.

The first and second grades have new reading charts. The first grade chart has a picture of a mountain with a white trail leading upward. At each bend of the trail there is a star which denotes a mark. The children are working to attain the highest star.

There have been a great many absences since vacation. Whooping cough appears to be responsible.

The primary grades have learned of thirteen birds since they have begun bird study.

The fifth and sixth grades have just finished making some book marks. These have for decoration, a lily plant which is inked and a border which is a thin ink line around each.

The fifth and sixth graders have been quite busy either drawing or outlining a story about each of the birds they have seen. The colored birds and outlines are being put into a nice booklet.

"Rain, Rain--" Etc.

Heavy rains which fell here in forepart of the week will delay seeding and other spring work for some time. Cheer up folks, a few days of nice hot sunshine will fix us all out in pretty good shape. If we were to compare the wetness here with the rains and big floods in the south, our soak-up would be mentioned only as a mere dampness.

Cleve Bergum Buys Store At Rosewood

Cleve Bergum closed a deal recently with a party in Rosewood for a store there. Mr. Bergum has been spending the week over there painting up the building and rearranging the stock. Herb Johnson, who was at one time in the confectionery business here, will manage the local store for Bergum.

CARLSON MERC. CO. BUYS STORE AT SAINT HILAIRE

The Carlson Mercantile Company who now own and operate three big stores at Holt, Middle River and Gatzke, closed a deal last week in which they became the owners of the large N. A. Nelson store at St. Hilaire. This makes their fourth general store which they will have in this territory, besides the undertaking business which they purchased recently from Anton Yngve of Middle River.

O. C. Johnson who has been connected with the firm for a number of years will move to St. Hilaire and take over the management of the new store. The people of St. Hilaire are fortunate to have the Carlson Mercantile company open a store there as they always carry a full line of stardard up-to-date goods, and do a good clean business where-ever they are located.

Chas. Fay Buys Farm Here

Chas. Fay and family arrived last week from Tacoma, Washington to start to build and improve their farm near Golden Valley. They used to live near Crookston up to about fifteen years ago, when they went out west. Mr. Fay traded some city property in Tacoma to M. Stewart of that place for his quarter section here. He will go into sheep and stock raising when he gets things arrared right.

Mr. Fay owns another farm in Minnesota, two in Wisconsin and one in Montana, but he says that the country around here is what he likes the best of them all.

WHAT MAY HAPPEN

Fires and Cyclones seldom arrive on schedule time They usually happen before. They have already happened this season. When they do blow in, the man who has a Fire and Tornado policy usually thanks the agent for giving him the tip in time.

The man whose property is scheduled in the total loss column of a Fire or Cyclone is usually the same fellow who was going to take his insurance out to-morrow.

Better take it out to-day. The premium isn't large, and the comfort's mighty big.

See us to day about your Fire and Wind Storm Insurance.

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, Tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it. Joe is arranging for a vacation trip. To Anne he betrays his enmity toward Sybil. Stokes tells Sybil he has news of Dallas, and to secure privacy they arrange to meet in a small summer house. The sound of a pistol shot startles the assembled company. Investigation shows a revolver has been taken from a desk in the library.

—7—

"That's just what we want to know. Where were you?"

"Sitting out on the balcony."

"See anybody?"

"No. I've been looking about. I went down the path to the pine grove and round the house but I didn't see a soul."

"Why, who could it be?" said Anne. "Aren't we all"—she looked over the standing figures—"No, we're not all here. Who's outside?"

"Mrs. Stokes is." Shine spoke up. "I saw her walking along the ocean bluffs as I came up from the point."

"Sybil is, too," Mrs. Cornell added. "She went out just a few minutes ago. I saw her from my window."

"It can't be either of them." Bassett's vexation had given place to a sudden uneasiness. "I don't understand. Nobody could have come over from the mainland with the tide up. I'll go out there—"

A sound from outside stopped him. It was a cry in a woman's voice, close by.

"What's that?" someone said, and before an answer could come, the cry rose again—a high wailing scream carrying words:

"Sybil! Sybil! Sybil's dead—Sybil's killed!"

A clamorous mingling of voices rose from the group, combined in a single up-swelling note of horror. The men rushed for the entrance and met Flora Stokes. She burst in between them, white as the ghost of Caesar, with her opened mouth a dark cavity.

"Sybil's murdered — dead — shot." Each word was projected in a screaming gasp.

Bassett shouted at her, "Where?"

And she waved an arm toward the channel.

"There—from the Point. She's gone—she's dead! She went over into the water. On the top of the cliff. She's murdered—dead—murdered!"

As if she were dead, too, and of no more consequence, they fled past her—a line of people streaming out into the serene evening that held a hideous catastrophe. Only Anne stayed, her face as if overlaid by a coating of white paint. She went to Flora and seized her by the arm.

"What was it?" she whispered. "Who did it?"

The woman looked at her at first as if not knowing who she was. Then jerking her arm free, clasped her hands against the sides of her head and went across the room staring upward and crying out:

"I don't know. I didn't see—. It's God's truth, I don't know."

Anne ran after the others.

CHAPTER V

The moon had risen and hung on the edge of the sky like a great disk of white paper. Anne saw the others running this way and that along the edge of the point. A boat was pushing out from the dock, Stokes in it, and, caught by the current, it shot down the gleaming surface of the channel. There were cries in men's voices and Stokes' answer, bell-clear from the water. Then Shine ran by her, back to the house, grim-visaged with staring eyes.

She ran on through the pine wood up the path beyond. Mrs. Cornell met her, tried to speak with chattering teeth, but ended in a scream and fell upon her shoulder. Over her head Anne saw Bassett flying down the slope to the wharf. Then presently boats moving out from Hayworth. They sped back and forth, up and down, swift black shapes that seemed to be executing some complicated maneuvers along the glittering track of moonlight. She was aware of Bassett's figure leaving the wharf and racing to the house, of Shine thudding by and calling:

"They're here already! I got someone on the wire and I told him to go like hell."

Miss Pinkney's voice answered him from the edge of the Point where she stood like a black basalt statue:

"Oh, they're here, all right. Every feller that has a boat's out. But it's no use; no one who's ever got caught in that current's been found."

Shine muttered an invocation and came to a stop. They all stood speechless staring at the boats—the boats looking for Sybil who half an hour ago was alive like themselves and now was—where?

As soon as he saw the fleet in operation, Bassett ran to the house. He had to find Flora and get fuller information from her before he called up the police, and not seeing her outside, he supposed she was still there. The great room was almost dark. He felt for one of the standard lamps and pulled the string. The gush of light fell directly over her, close to him, sunk in an armchair, as still as if she, too, had ceased to live. He had expected difficulties in getting a coherent statement from her, but she told him what she had seen, briefly and clearly, as if she had known he was coming and was ready for him.

She had skirted the island and come to that part of the path which faced the Point. A hollow intervened, extending to the water's edge in a mass of shelving rock. Across this hollow she saw Sybil appear on the end of the Point, coming up from the opposite side, and almost immediately heard the shot. Sybil had thrown up her arms, staggered forward and gone over the bluff. It all happened in a flash and Flora, though describing herself as dazed, had run down the path into the hollow and out on the rocks thinking she could catch her. But she saw the body go swirling by—far out of her reach, caught and borne along in the current. She had watched it, stunned, then had come to her senses and staggered back to the shore—and ran to the house. On the way there she had seen no one and heard nothing.

Bassett left her and went to the library to call up Forestville, the county seat. It was the starting point for hunting parties to New Brunswick, and Bassett, a sportsman in his leisure hours, had stayed there several times assembling his guides and gear. On his last trip, two years ago, trouble with a guide had brought him in contact with the sheriff, Abel Williams. Over legal wrangling they had struck up a friendship and he remembered Williams as a man of some capacity, straight and fair-minded. If he was still in office it would simplify matters; to start out with confidence in the director would be a vital gain. He waited, the receiver against his ear, a foot drumming on the carpet, then a deep and growling voice hummed along the wire. It was Abel Williams.

Williams would be down as soon as he could, with Mr. Rawson, the district attorney—an hour and a half to two hours, the roads being bad. The shore people had been told it was an accident—that's all right, couldn't hold an inquest anyway without a body and it was a good thing to keep 'em off. Better not let anything come out till they'd got the situation in hand, easy to fix at that end as the United American Press man was off fishing. They'd do a good deal better if the press was held off for a spell. Seeing where the island was and that there was no one on it but their own crowd, it would be possible to keep things out of the public eye till they had the work well started.

Bassett looked at his watch—nearly eight—probably two hours to wait. The best thing he could do was to get them together and keep them as quiet as he could. As he went down the path his mind collected and marshaled in order the facts he would have to present. They had all been in the house except Stokes on the balcony and Flora walking round the island. Stokes eaten into by a hopeless love, Flora on fire with jealousy and hate—passions that make for murder. "God, what's going to be the end of this?" he groaned to himself.

He found them in a group near the pine grove, excitedly conferring together. Stokes had just returned with the electric torch and they were preparing to search the ground for footprints. Bassett brought their activities to an end and shepherded them to the house. With dragging feet and lowered heads they trailed up the path and filed into the living room.

Here, under the radiance of the lights, they looked at one another as if expecting to see startling changes and fell groaning into chairs, or sat, stiff and upright, with rigid muscles. Bassett had told them when the authorities might be expected and as the hour drew near, dread of the drama in which they found themselves stilled their tongues. The sea breeze, freighted with the acrid odors of uncovered mud and seaweed, blew through the room. Bassett rose and closed the garden door, and eyes shifted to him, hung on his hand as it slid the bolt.

He crossed to where Anne was sitting by the entrance. She had her back to the room and was looking out at the lights of Hayworth dotting the shore. He stood behind her chair and put his hand on her shoulder. Her fingers stole up and rested on his, icy cold. He bent till his head was close to hers and whispered:

"Bear up. Thank God this can't touch you in any way."

Her fingers pressed an answer but she said nothing.

Shine came toward them: "Those fellers were lucky who got off this afternoon. I might have gone with them if I'd had the sense."

Anne answered this time:

"Yes, they were more fortunate than we are."

Mrs. Cornell, between sobs, spoke up:

"But even if we were here they can't suspect us. We've got alibis, we're all accounted for. We were all in—"

She realized where she was going and stopped. There was a portentous silence. Shine almost shouted, pointing out at the channel:

"The tide's falling fast. They can't get into the dock here. How will they make a landing?"

Bassett answered:

"In a cove at the upper end of the island. They've a dock there for low water. They have to make a detour that's all."

Flora, who had been sitting with her hand over her eyes, dropped it and sat erect. Her breath came from her in a loud exhalation that was almost a groan. Every pair of eyes shifted to her, watchful, questioning, apprehensive.

"Do you feel ill, Flora?" said Bassett, moving to her side.

"No—no," she looked wildly about. "But this waiting—it's so awful."

Miss Pinkney suggested a glass of water, but Flora waved a hand as if pushing it away. Stokes rose and moved to a seat beside her.

"They'll be here soon now."

She sank back and closed her eyes. Her husband bent a somber, sidewise look toward her, then laid his hand on one of hers. Her own turned and the thin fingers twined like clinging roots about his.

"It won't be hard," he reassured. "Just give them a clear account of what you saw."

She waved the other hand in front of her face, like a person in unendurable pain, who makes a vague distracted gesture for silence.

Anne spoke from the door:

"There's a light moving out from the shore."

The statement shook them. There was a simultaneous stir of feet and bodies, a heave of labored breaths.

Bassett went to the entrance:

"Yes—that's a launch. They're coming. I must go to meet them."

He looked over the company, the haggard faces all turned toward him. Some of them wore an expression of yearning appeal as if he was their only source of strength in this devastating hour:

"Now, remember there's nothing to get scared or rattled about. They'll ask you questions and what you must do is to answer them accurately—not what you think or imagine but what you know. Keep that in the front of your minds. The clearer you are in your statements the quicker you'll get through. And please stay here, just as you are. They'll probably want to see you right off."

A benumbed silence followed his departure. Anne moved from the door to a chair nearer the others. Stokes withdrew his hand from Flora's and straightened himself, jerking down his waistcoat and craning his neck up from his collar. The low rippling murmurs of the receding tide were singularly distinct. Suddenly the shrill whistle of a launch pierced the night outside. Mrs. Cornell leaped as if the sound had been a weapon that had stabbed her:

"Oh!" she cried, "why do they do that? Isn't Sybil being murdered enough to stand!"

"For God's sake, keep your mouth shut," Stokes flung at her, glaring.

The savage quality in his voice penetrated Mrs. Cornell's encasing terrors. She shrunk and slid the look of a frightened animal at Shine. Then the silence settled and they sat like those who have looked upon the head of Medusa.

Tender Notes Burned by Mrs. Washington

After George Washington's death his widow burned every letter that she had received from him, with the exception of three or four that escaped apparently by accident.

No one has ever elucidated the motive behind this letter burning episode. Martha Washington knew at the time, indeed, the whole world knew, that George Washington was a star of the first magnitude in the field of history and that every scrap of his writing would be treasured and printed. Did she feel that his letters to her were so sacred in their intimacy that posterity had no right to read them?

But there are other tenable hypotheses. She was antidemocratic and antipublic to an extreme degree. Considering her as surrounded by such limitations of perspective, one may readily conceive that her motive may have been simply one of aristocratic seclusion.

In destroying his letters she effectually effaced herself, for she lived only in his reflected light. But that may have been what she wanted. The highest form of pride is a disdainful humility.—The Nation.

The Face of Our Mother

IT IS the first face that waited for us, the first face that greeted us, the first face that kissed us.

It is the face that watched our babyhood, that read the language of our smiles and the message of our tears.

It is the face that watches us as we grow.

It is the face that never turns away.

It is the face that lights at our joys, clouds at our sorrows, smiles at our smiles, weeps at our tears.

It is the face that turns to us tho' we turn to others.

It is the face that gave its beauty for our life.

It is the face on which Constancy has carved its immortal figurement.

It is the face on which Love has written its undying message.

It is the face which has no equal and no counterpart.

It is the face poets have sung and artists drawn.

It is the face that has made men, and held men, and saved men.

It is the face the infant first remembers and the old man last forgets.

It is the face that time can never touch, for its features are Love.

It is the face that looked for us from Eternity and will look for us in Eternity.

It is the face that has helped us, inspired us, comforted us, forgiven us.

It is the face that gives all and asks nothing.

It is the most beautiful face in the world: The face of our Mother!

Mother Love Second Only to That of God

The chief thing which crowns all true motherhood is her unselfish love. A mother's love is eternal, it never dies. It makes no difference how deep in sin her child may go her love never fails. No one perhaps has more accurately described the love of a mother than Kipling in "Mother O' Mine."

If I were hanged on the highest hill,
Mother o' mine, O mother o' mine!
I know whose love would follow me still,
Mother o' mine, O mother o' mine!

If I were drowned in the deepest sea,
Mother o' mine, O mother o' mine!
I know whose tears would come down to me,
Mother o' mine, O mother o' mine!

If I were damned of body and soul,
I know whose prayers would make me whole,
Mother o' mine, O mother o' mine!

Only the love of the infinite God above us surpasses that of a true mother. Irving said, "A mother is the truest friend we have, when trials heavy and sudden fall upon us; when adversity takes the place of prosperity; when friends who rejoice with us in our sunshine desert us, when troubles thicken around us, still will she cling to us and endeavor by her kind precepts and counsels to dissipate the clouds of darkness and cause peace to return to our hearts. God has given to us many beautiful varieties of flowers. He has given us many kinds of precious ore, but He has given us only one mother that we might treasure her the more." The ways of love and tenderness are never out of style; remember this and tell her so—don't wait till after awhile. Let not affection wane with years! it waneth not for you.

Reason for Mothers

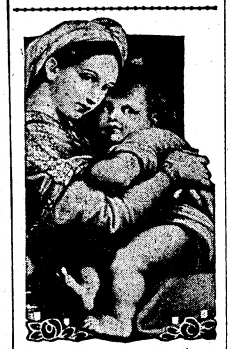
Because He loves the children so God gave them mothers just to be His holy ministers below, to fit them for eternity.

Because all mothers are His care, God lends the helplessness and grace of childish hands to lead them where their angels always see His face.—Anna B. Bryant.

Symbol of the Day

The white carnation early was adopted as the symbol of day; its whiteness for purity, its form and fragrance representing beauty and love, and its wide field of growth and lasting qualities symbolizing charity and faithfulness—all a true mother's virtues. The white carnation remains the recognized symbol of Mother's day, though usage has introduced the wearing of the red carnation in tribute to living mothers. Other flowers are worn when carnations are not available.

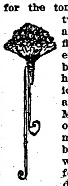
Mother



Rare gems in earth are hidden deep
And from the forest sod
The fairest bloom wafts its perfume
An incense up to God.
There is a gem of greater worth,
A bloom, like to none other,
'Twas born in heaven to bless the earth
This treasure we call "Mother."

Her love allayed our early fears
Along life's troubled way,
Her counsel lasts when she has passed
Beyond terrestrial way.
Then bring her cheer, if she be here,
If gone, there is no other,
One priceless gift God gave to all,
When He gave us a "Mother."
—Alice M. Seaman, in Boston Globe.

'Tis Mother's Day



American gratitude garlands effigies for the tomb of Washington every twenty-second of February and American patriotism flames and fortifies itself every Independence day; but sacred and sweet to the hearts of all true Americans are the memorials and ministries of their Mother's day—a day no other nation has unanimously ennobled. He must be an inspired worshiper who can vocalize his love for his mother beyond her deserts. He is an ethereal poet who can set to word-music the wealth of her merits. He is a transcendent orator who can compass the volume of her full eulogy. The great story of her peril for our being, of her efforts for our education, of her sacrifices for our health and happiness, of her pangs for our pains, of her agonies for our aberrant actions, of her raptures over our triumphs, just cannot be composed in human words. Senator Reed of Missouri came as near to doing it as any could hope, perhaps, when in a great debate he said: "Mother's love! It has produced, fondled, reared, inspired and glorified all of the shadowy hosts who have passed across the 'bank of time' since man first raised his eyes toward the heavens. It is, I say again, the golden cord that binds the earth to God!"

To that wonderful love, to her who gave it to us, we wear her dedicated flower and sing to her, whether present or absent, the supreme pean in our heart.

Mother Influence in Life of the Redeemer

No incident in connection with the mighty tragedy of the Cross has any deeper pathos or finer significance than the recorded words, "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother." There can be little doubt that, deep as was her understanding of His life and the import of His ministry, she was incapable of comprehending, to its full worth, the significance of the crucifixion. No written words could indicate the depth of her sorrow or the greatness of her disappointment. In few of the lives of the great and the good does the mother influence figure so largely as in the life of Jesus. One yearns to know something of those years of obscurity lived in Nazareth and of the intimacies that existed between mother and Son. What a record such pages would make of motherly love and filial devotion! We do not have to strain our imagination to conceive in what explicit and loving terms He talked with her concerning the great issues of His life. Doubtless to no one did He confide the purpose of His life's work as to His mother, and certainly from no one else did He receive such assurances of devotion and encouragement. Little wonder is it that the master painters of the world have concentrated their genius in producing on canvas this glowing and glorious intimacy. Raphael's brush perhaps above all others has produced the immortal canvas of Mother and Child. The whole story of the Gospel lifts motherhood to higher levels of distinction than it had ever known before, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, is the highest approximation of our ideals concerning this most sacred of all offices.

TWO HOMES MADE HAPPY

By Women Who Used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I think it is the most wonderful medicine I ever tried," is the statement made by Mrs. Goldie Shoup of St. Joseph, Illinois. She declares that after taking the Compound she is in better health than before.

Mrs. J. Storms of 29 Lane Street, Paterson, N. J., writes: "I cannot speak too highly of your medicine and I recommend it to all my friends."

These statements were taken from two enthusiastic letters which tell of the help that has been received from using the Vegetable Compound. Both Mrs. Shoup and Mrs. Storms were in a run-down condition which caused them much unhappiness. When women are suffering from lack of strength and from weakness, their own life and that of their family is affected. When they feel well and strong and are able to do their housework easily, happy homes are the result.

Great Northern Railway Building Nation's Longest Tunnel. American Magazine Widely Heralds Northwest Achievement

St. Paul, Minn.—In the May number of the American Magazine, Keene Summer has written an article descriptive of "the Great Cascade Tunnel" now in course of construction for the Great Northern Railway. This is to be the longest tunnel in the United States, nearly 8 miles in length, and it will facilitate in a marked degree the ability of the Hill line to handle transcontinental freight and passenger traffic. "Up in our big Northwest, separated from each other by more than a thousand miles, are two groups of men who are feeling rather proud these days," the article says, by way of introduction. "We ought to feel proud of them, for they are doing a tremendous job and are breaking all previous records for that kind of work."

"The men in one of these two groups may be found—at least, sometimes—at their offices in St. Paul, Minnesota. The other group is out in the towering Cascade Mountains of the state of Washington.

"When I say in the mountains I mean just that. For these men are driving a tunnel through the Cascade Range, a tunnel which will be the longest in the Western Hemisphere and one of the five longest in the world.

"It is being constructed by A. Guthrie and Company for the Great Northern Railway; and both companies have their head offices in St. Paul. In the Great Northern offices are the two men who planned the undertaking; Ralph Budd, president of the road, and J. R. W. Davis, its chief engineer.

"The contract between the railroad and the Guthrie Company was a surprisingly brief document, considering the magnitude of the job. But, short as it was, Mr. Budd took care to write into it the name of the man whom he wanted to have charge of the work.

"That man was J. C. Baxter, vice president of the Guthrie Company. He is a civil engineer who has come up from the foot of the ladder in his profession; and to be at the foot of the civil engineering ladder means working with a construction gang, and may mean, as in this case it did mean doing actual pick-and-shovel labor.

"About 15 years ago, when Ralph Budd was chief engineer of the Great Northern, J. C. Baxter worked under him; out in those very mountains, by the way, which are now being pierced by the new tunnel.

"Baxter's name was written into the Cascade contract, because Mr. Budd knew him to be not only a civil engineer but also a human engineer. So the story of the tunnel is one of machines and of methods—plus men.

"Baxter was born in New Jersey, moved to California when he was four years old, moved to Salt Lake City a few years later, and has been moving—or, at any rate, on the move—ever since.

"When he was a youngster, Baxter became a machinist's apprentice; but he quit that job in order to sample others. Among them was the humble task of shoveling dirt with a construction gang—and right there his sampling days ended! For when he realized that the engineering ladder rose out of the very dirt which he shoveled, he determined to stick to that ladder.

"He never has taken a technical course in college. When he directs a construction job to-day, he does it as a graduate from the school of experience. He has worked at highway construction, mine stripping, shaft sinking, tunnel driving, railroad and bridge building—all the way from the East to the West, and from Mexico to Alaska.

"It was in 1890 that John F. Stevens, then chief engineer of the Great Northern, led a surveying party through the forests of the Cascade Range, searching for a route by which the railroad might cross the mountains.

"Between two points, which later became the stations Berne and Scenic, he found a pass which seemed to be the most promising. The road was built there, climbing over the pass by a series of switchbacks. In 1900 this was altered into the line which is now used.

"The line between Scenic and Berne is about eighteen miles long. Coming east from Scenic, it has to climb 1,325 feet, pass through six tunnels and six miles of snowsheds. Five of the tunnels are very short. The sixth is almost three miles in length making the total length of covered track about nine miles. When the line reaches the summit elavation at 3,380 it descends 546 feet to Berne.

"The weight of a railroad trains runs into hundreds of tons! And to drag this weight up hundreds of feet is an herculean job. It costs money, too; and it takes time. As both money and time are the great factors in modern railway operation, that eighteen-mile bit of road has always given Great Northern officials something to think about.

"Moreover, there were those six miles of snowsheds. In themselves, the snowsheds of our Western railroads are a triumph of human ingenuity over the forces of Nature. Built of concrete walls and great timbers, their roofs are almost an integral part of the mountainsides which they follow.

"The conception and building of these snowsheds formed one of the dramatic chapters in the history of our railroads. But when Nature "built" a mountain side, she turned out a permanent job; whereas, a snowshed has to be maintained, repaired, and occasionally rebuilt. To do this work on the six miles of sheds between Scenic and Berne costs hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. And here is an interesting fact: The new tunnel, which will eliminate those sheds entirely, will cost about ten million dollars. But the saving, on the upkeep of the sheds alone, will more than pay the interest on this investment.

"That is not all which the tunnel will accomplish. The line between Berne and Scenic will be ten miles long instead of eighteen. The climb will be 501 feet less each way. If all the present curves were added together, they would form just about six complete circles; but the new tunnel will be straight from end to end. As for the important factor of time, the tunnel will save one hour in the running time of passenger trains, and three hours on freight trains.

"These results may, or many not, sound important to you. It depends on whether you have any conception of the job of "railroading". Most of us have no real understanding of this job, which calls for billions of dollars, uses the labor of hundreds of thousands of men, and without which our modern life would be utterly impossible.

"As for the days of railroad romance being over, let's read this one new chapter, with its story of the ten million dollar Cascade tunnel.

"It was in November, 1925, that the plans were submitted to the Great Northern's board of directors and approved by them. But that had been preceded by months of study, consultation, and calculations.

"And these men have made a world record so far as tunnel driving is concerned. When the work started, it was estimated that three years would be required to finish it. But at the present rate of advance the tunnel will be completed and trains will be running through it weeks before the three years are up."

Eating Greater Cause of Death Than Drinking

Drink is the second greatest cause of disease and death. Food comes first, then drink. Excluding alcoholic beverages, there are dozens of drinks on the market today whose effect is detrimental, particularly to children.

Milk is the best drink for children. Not only is it drink, but food as well—the most nearly perfect food known to man.

Milk is an all-the-year-round drink and for this reason the children often rebel against drinking it. This condition, however, may be overcome by the introduction of the mixed drink. Milk or diluted evaporated milk may be mixed with eggs or used in fruit juices or in some other way which will disguise the fact that the drink contains milk. In the hot summer months when the child naturally drinks more than in cooler weather, it is wise to vary the ways of serving milk, so as not to create a distaste for this important food.

In connection with mixed drinks, the following formulas for milk beverages may aid mothers in serving something new:

Iced Cocoa

3 tbsp. cocoa
2 tbsp. sugar
½ cup hot water
Few grains salt
1½ cups evaporated milk diluted with
1½ cups water
¼ tsp. vanilla

Scald the diluted milk in a double boiler. Mix cocoa, sugar, salt and add the hot water. Cook over a low flame from 10 to 15 minutes, stirring occasionally to prevent burning. Add to the cocoa the scalded milk; return to the double boiler and continue cooking for 10 minutes. Add vanilla, chill before serving. Pour into tall glasses which contain a few small cubes of ice. Serve plain or top with whipped cream sprinkled with cinnamon. Serves four.

Egg-Nog.

1 egg
Few grains salt
1 tbsp. sugar
Few gratings nutmeg
2-3 cup cold evaporated milk diluted with
2-3 cup ice water
2 tbsp. berry or cherry juice or
2 tbsp. non-alcoholic sherry

Separate white from yolk of egg. Add salt to white and beat until stiff. Beat yolk until thick and lemon colored and add the fruit juices, nutmeg and sugar. Combine diluted milk with yolk mixture. Pour into a tall glass and put the egg white on top. Sprinkle top with chopped nuts and serve at once. Serves one.

Orange-Nog.

½ cup orange juice
Few grains salt
2 1-3 tsp. sugar
1-3 cup evaporated milk diluted with
1-3 cup cold water

Add sugar and salt to orange juice and pour slowly into the diluted milk, stirring to mix thoroughly. Chill before serving. One-half tsp. lemon improves this drink for many. Serves one.

Flying Navy Church Flag

The navy church flag is in the shape of a pennant and is a blue cross on a white field. There are flags of three sizes, the smallest of which is 6 feet long and 2 feet wide. The length of the cross is 2 feet. The width of the cross at the base and top is 5 inches and the cross bar 14 inches. The head of the cross of the church flag should be placed toward the flagpole.

A simple test that proves the economy of good paint. A given quantity of good paint covers 25% to 50% more surface than the same quantity of poor paint.

Good Paint Costs Less!

IT'S a fact—good paint actually costs you less to use than poor paint. A low price per gallon on poor paint is deceiving because it takes more gallons to cover a given surface and then you haven't got a job that will protect as well or last as long as good paint.

WHAT WAS CINDERELLA'S LAST NAME?

When the Brothers Grimm wrote their immortal fairy tales, they didn't tell us Cinderella's last name. But Cinderella's last name must have been Electricity.

For, like Cinderella, electricity in the home does the housework all day long, and at night shines forth in dazzling splendor, filling the room with brilliant light.

There's one difference, however. The radient Cinderella vanished at midnight, while electricity works on steadily, always at your beck and call. For that you can thank your Electric Power and Light Company, on the job night and day to make a fairy tale come true.

Make the most of this modern miracle by having plenty of outlets and plenty of household appliances—clothes washer, iron, sewing machine, vacuum cleaner, and all the others that help do the housework more quickly, more thoroly, than Cinderella ever could.

Spring Tints
(Copyright 1927)

Gaily colored frocks this Spring! Underthings in soft shades to match. Tint them in ordinary water—but with true dyes. Dipping will do it—in ordinary cold water—but you must have real dye to get a smooth, perfectly even tone.

Diamond dye powder is fifteen cents at any drug store; so why do half a job with something not half so effective? And when you want the tint to be permanent, just dip in boiling water instead of cold!

The druggist has color cards and simple directions for doing perfect dyeing of all sorts of material; silk or wool; linen, cotton goods; mixed goods, or any goods at all; and exquisite tinting of dainty things. Or, send for a marvelous book of suggestions in full colors. Ask for Color Craft! Address DIAMOND DYES, Dept. N31, Burlington, Vermont.

45TH LEGISLATIVE SESSION CLOSES

Minnesota Law-Makers Windup Duties After Long Grind.

St. Paul—A 12-hour deadlock was broken when the 45th legislative session came to a tired end, with Governor Theodore Christianson scoring almost a complete victory for his economic program.

School appropriations tied the legislature in a knot all through a turbulent night, during which a special session was both threatened and predicted, while conferences and caucuses squabbled for solution. In the end, suggestions of Governor Christianson for a compromise agreement on the issue prevailed, both houses accepted the plan, and weeks of controversy ended.

Total appropriations exceed $42,000,000, meaning that $1,000,000 or more will face the gubernatorial pruning knife. In addition, certificates of indebtedness totaling $1,786,758 are to be issued, solving for all time old debts of school aid and mothers pension.

The excitement of the closing night of the legislature failed to stir either house of lawmakers into any particularly spectacular fights, and passed more peacefully than other recent "last nights" in the legislature.

The senate spent the early part of the evening passing bills under suspension of the rules, to which there were no objections from any members, and the house was doing the same.

The senate stopped the clock so that none could say that it worked beyond the midnight hour. The constitution demands that the passing of bills cease at midnigt, but it has been legislative custom to wink at the happy forethought of the framers of the document and dodge around the rule by stopping the clock.

A list of important bills passed by the legislature follows:

Six reforestation laws, setting up machinery for private land owners to cultivate trees under special deferred tax arrangements, for the state to establish forest lands and promote growing of merchantable timber, and to continue through an interim committee the study of the intricate problem during the next two years.

Group of crime prevention laws, the principal features being creation of a state bureau of criminal apprehension to gather information about criminals and crimes from local peace officers and to disseminate it in order to lesson the crime wave; passage of a "Baumes" law requiring persons convicted of felonies to serve heavy extra terms on second and subsequent offenses.

Banking Laws Amended.

Group of banking laws amending existing statutes so that the bank examiner will have more power and bank officers will be restricted further in the loaning of money.

Proposed constitutional amendment relieving stockholders of double liability.

Readjusting motor truck license scheduled so that commercial trucks used by private concerns will pay fees of 3.4 per cent of value instead of 5 per cent.

Creation of a commission to study river pollution problems in the Twin City area.

Creation of a commission to promote development of upper Mississippi river navigation.

Establishing a system of tenure for teachers in public schools of the Twin Cities and Duluth by which they cannot be removed without hearing.

"Basic Sciences" Bill Passed.

Requiring persons entering healing professions to qualify in "basic sciences" and establishing a board to conduct examinations.

Imposing further regulations upon hair dressers, beauty culturists, barbers and masseurs.

Regulating municipal bond issues, requiring sinking funds to retire them within life of the improvement and limiting total debts in proportion to assessed property valuation.

Limiting township tax levies on Iron Range.

Requiring foreign corporations doing business in Minnesota to pay same corporate fees as domestic corporations.

Requiring municipalities and school districts to report annually to counties their bonds outstanding, and counties to submit reports to state tax commission.

Permitting owners of land upon which taxes are delinquent to pay off taxes in 10 annual payments.

Omnibus game and fish bill amending many sections of present laws.

Uniform traffic code for state highways.

Resident fishing licenses.

Unanimous Committee Report Says Schall Charges Unproved

The special senate committee appointed to investigate the 1924 campaign of United States Senator Thomas D. Schall, submitted a unanimous report of its findings to the president of the senate, stating that the charges against Schall had not been proved.

The report was a compromise reached after hours of executive session, in which both sides gave ground to eliminate the presentation of a minority report.

"The evidence taken as a whole is not sufficiently clear, convincing and satisfactory to enable the committee to find that the charges contained in the resolution have been proven," the conclusion of the committee in the report read.

Senators W. A. Blanchard, H. A. Larson and L. P. Johnson were agreed on the general outlines of the statement, and then Senator James Carley was won over. After further compromise Senator Victor Lawson, author of the resolution, which brought on the investigation, was induced to attach his name to the report, and the possibility of a minority report was wiped out.

No attempt was made in the report to go into detail on the conflicting testimony which the month of hearings brought out, but it did summarize in a general way the salient facts brought out. Among other things it held that Jacobs through his bootleg operations collected more than $10,000 and that a considerable portion of that money was used by him in financing "expenses incident to and connected with the conduct of the so-called West hotel headquarters, and his activities on behalf of Senator Schall."

In their findings the committee exonerated all federal officials whose names were brought into the investigation stating that they acted "honestly and in good faith" and that the evidence casts no "substantial or reliable suspicion" upon any of them.

HIGHLIGHTS ON LEGISLATURE

Politically, the 1927 legislature was thoroughly conservative. The Farmer-Labor faction had smaller minorities in each house than in former sessions and did not make an effort to push a comprehensive program.

* * *

Creation of a commission to work for national farm relief legislation and the McNary-Haugen bill in particular was approved as one of the final acts of the legislature. The house passed the bill which had weathered the senate with no difficulty.

* * *

The state is given the right to amend indictments in criminal cases before trial begins in a third bill signed and a fourth enactment requires the prosecuting attorney in criminal cases to place in the court records his reason for asking dismissal of charges, together with his recommendations.

* * *

Two bills, companion measures, signed by the governor raised the minimum sentence that may be imposed in felony cases. Under the terms of one of the measures, a minimum five-year sentence can be imposed when a gun is used in the commission of a felony, if the judge so rules. Another makes one year the flat minimum for felonies when sentence is to prison or reformatory.

* * *

Appropriations of $25,000 for an audit of the offices of the state treasury and state auditor was approved by both houses. Provisions of the audit are: That it be made under supervision of Clifford L. Hilton, attorney general. That he employ auditors not regularly employed by the state to make the examination. That the audit findings be a report signed by a certified public accountant. The audit will cover the period since 1920.

* * *

One feature of the session was the proclivity shown for conducting investigations. Hardly had the session started than a joint committee was named to study the banking situation and upon this committee's report most of the banking bills were proposed and passed. Then came the notorious Schall investigation which dragged all through the last half of the session. The senate was asked to investigate charges that a former state securities commissioner had been negligent in his duty in allowing stocks to be sold under permits which afterward proved to be of doubtful value. This was referred to the attorney general's office. In the same way the attorney general's office was given the task of starting an audit into the books of the state treasurer and auditor to determine if there are any shortages existing which have not yet been discovered.

Voile Frocks for Girls

Dainty little handmade frocks of voile for the younger girl have come from Paris. The colors are youthful and charming, including all the flower shades and several more vivid. Bits of drawnwork and handwork constitute the decoration. They are simple in line and beautifully made.

Black and Pink

Filmy frocks of black chiffon and lace are worn over slips of pink satin or chiffon.

Black, Fall Favorite

Black is easily first among colors which make their appearance in the styles of the autumn and winter, on the basis of the fashion displays in Paris. Navy blue apparently will be second and a new shade of dark red third. Velvet, it is generally predicted, will be the favorite material, with kasha second.

As White Is Worn

White is popular when worn with contrasting colors, never alone.

Not All Animals Are Wisely Led by Instinct

Animal instinct is not the infallible, divinely inspired affair that is commonly supposed, according to Dr. William E. Ritter. Many times instinct causes an animal to do things in the wrong place or at the wrong time or else to repeat an act unnecessarily, thus wasting energy. Occasionally instinct, misapplied in this way, may do the animal actual harm.

An instance of the senseless repetition due to instinct may be found in the woodpecker that pecks far more holes than he ever fills and fills many more than he ever empties.

The same repetition of activity was demonstrated by a young monkey. It was literally fed up on peanuts at the end of a visiting day, yet when balked in an attempt to reach them put up a good fight, only to discard the nuts the minute they were obtained.—Hygeia Magazine.

Never in the history of centrifugal cream separators has there been a machine equal to the De Laval. Each model has, in its day, been far ahead of all other machines in skimming efficiency, ease of operation and superior durability.

The present model De Laval is the crowning achievement of all. It has the wonderful new self-centering bowl which runs smoother and easier, eliminating vibration and thus making the separator still more durable.

You will get a richer, smoother, higher-testing cream with this new De Laval—and more of it, too. Best of all, your old cream-wasting separator will be accepted as part payment—no matter what its age, make or condition. Bring it in and we will arrange a "swap" so that your new De Laval will actually pay for itself while you are using it.

Inertia is a great and potent influence, the power of which is perhaps not fully realized. It has kept men in bondage, caused wars, prevented the triumph of justice and common sense over wrong and superstition. Sometimes it is called laziness.—Chicago News.

New England Claims Peony

No flower is associated more closely with New England than the peony, partly because it grows unusually well there, but more particularly for the reason that many of the finest varieties have been originated in that section. For years Boston was the peony center of the entire country, and even yet stands close to the top, although several sections in the West are coming to the front.

MORE HORSEPOWER FOR FARM RELIEF

All proposed plans have thus far failed to provide the farmer with farm relief by increasing his selling prices. Industry, however, met a somewhat similar situation by lowering the cost of production. A similar solution can be successfully applied to agriculture.

The increasing of production per worker on the farm is being met to a certain extent by using larger units of power, whether horse or mechanical. Where one man was using a single horse or team he is now using from 3 to 8 horses, thus increasing the ground covered from two to five times. By the use of larger power units hired labor can be reduced or eliminated.

An analysis of raising corn divides costs according to the following:

Land	50 percent
Labor	20 percent
Power	20 percent
Miscellaneous	10 percent

Of these items one can be considered stationary, namely, the land cost. Labor and power are variable and have been the main obstructions to lower production costs. Larger power units are doing much to decrease labor factors. Also, larger power units if used over larger farm areas can do much to lower the power percentage.

Professor J. B. Davidson, senior agricultural engineer, United States Department of Agriculture, summing up investigational work in 36 states, offers this equation for farming:

$$I = (S - C)Q$$

When "I" equals income
"S" is selling price
"C" is cost of production
"Q" is the quantity of production

Professor Davidson states: "Where quantity of production is held uppermost one finds prosperous farmers who plan to farm more acres without increasing the overhead."

Corn controls central western agriculture. In that area the acreage one man can farm is dependent on the number he can cultivate. With the single row cultivator he was unable to cultivate more than four to seven acres per day. The two row cultivator doubled this amount. Three and four row cultivators are now on the market—even six row were used this season. It cultivates fifty acres per day.

Wreck of Ghost City in "The Canyon of Light"

One of the most thrilling scenes ever shown in pictures is the wrecking of a "ghost city" in "The Canyon of Light" starring Tom Mix, which will be shown at the Holt Community Hall Thursday, May 19.

This "ghost city" is a deserted, old-time boom town, and in the fight between Tom Mix, the hero, and a gang of desperados, building after building is wrecked in one of the most gripping sequences imaginable. Dorothy Dwan, William Walling, Ralph Sipperly, Barry Norton, Carl Miller, Duke Lee, and Carmelita Geraghty support Mix.

Come and see this picture at the Community Hall next Thursday night.

Millions Of Fish Fry Being Planted In Lake

Last Sunday morning the special car of the Minnesota Game and Fish Commission was switched from the morning passenger at this point. The car contained about five million whitefish fry which was at once taken to various points in the lake for planting, this in a small measure will help replenish the fish of the big lake. It is claimed that at least 50 per cent of the fry will mature.

We notice by the Kenora Miner and News that the Provincial hatchery at Kenora have twenty million whitefish fry ready to plant and expect to have about 110 million pickeral fry ready in a few days. These fry will be planted at various points in Lake of the Woods.—Warroad Pioneer.

The LEADING LADY

by GERALDINE BONNER

COPYRIGHT by The BOBBS-MERRILL CO.

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, member of an influential family, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, Tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it. Joe is arranging for a vacation trip. To Anne he betrays his enmity toward Sybil. Stokes tells Sybil he has news of Dallas, and to secure privacy they arrange to meet in a small summer house. The sound of a pistol shot startles the assembled company. Investigation shows a revolver has been taken from a desk in the library. Flora, Stokes' wife, bursts in with the announcement that Sybil has been shot and her body carried off by the tide. Flora Stokes tells Bassett she saw Sybil shot but did not see her murderer. Bassett notifies the sheriff, Abel Williams.

Bassett on the wharf in the cove watched the launch approaching over the glistening floor of water. As it grated against the boards he heard his name in a deep-throated bass voice and the big body of the sheriff climbed over the side. A rough padded hand grasped his, and "Well, Mr. Bassett, the law's got us together again," was growled into his ear.

Two more figures followed him. One was Rawson, the district attorney, whom the vivid light revealed as a man much younger than Williams, tall and narrow-shouldered, with a lean New England visage and a pair of horn spectacles astride a high-bridged nose. The other was disposed of with a casual hand-wave and a murmur of "Patrick," brought, it was explained, to take charge of the causeway. Rawson, it appeared, knew Gull island well, having been there several times on legal business for Mr. Driscoll.

As they walked back Bassett told his story. He noticed that the younger man's questions were sharp and to the point and before they had gone half way realized that Rawson was of a much higher grade of education and intelligence than his coadjutor. A smart chap, he thought, and felt his burden lightened—they could do good teamwork.

Williams observed with grim relish:

"You couldn't have a murder committed in a better place than this—better for us. Once you're on here it's a d—d hard business getting off. These folks are as good as in prison. Now, Mr. Bassett, just where does that causeway lie?"

The channel stretched before them, a shining expanse, ripple-creased, summits of rock emerging. The receding water was like a silver veil being slowly withdrawn, its delicate tissue torn by sharp-edged projections. Bassett pointed beyond the wharf:

"There! Below the water there are steps cut in the rock that lead down to it. The whole stretch won't be clear till nearly midnight."

Williams gave his instructions to the man Patrick—a watch on the causeway, anyone stopped who came from the mainland or attempted to leave the island. Patrick, a silent massive countryman, with a stolid bulldog face, thrust out his chin and nodded. He slouched off, the sound of his heavy boots loud on the rocks. The others turned toward the house, the light from its opened door falling outward in a long golden square.

The occupants of the room heard them and looked at one another. Mrs. Cornell, with clenched hands, slowly stood up, and the rest, like people in church who see a figure rise and simultaneously follow its example, got to their feet.

The three men entered and under the shadow of the gallery paused for a moment surveying the standing figures much as they might have looked at some spectacle arranged for their approval. Bassett, with no precedent to guide him, walked toward his associates and announced:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the authorities have come. Mr. Rawson and Mr. Williams."

They bowed and then not knowing what to do next, subsided into their seats. The men came forward, moving to the long table, where Williams sat down, fumbling in his pocket for a fountain pen and paper and clearing a space for the taking of notes. Rawson, surveying the seated assemblage, said:

"This is the whole of your company, Mr. Bassett?"

"All who were here at the time of the murder. Several of the actors and assistants left at five-thirty and Joe Tracy, one of the company, at a quarter to seven."

"You saw them go?"

"I saw the first lot go. I didn't see Tracy. But," he looked at Anne, "this is his sister, Miss Tracy. She probably did."

"Did you, Miss Tracy?" said Rawson.

Her voice was very low but steady and clear:

"Yes, he went."

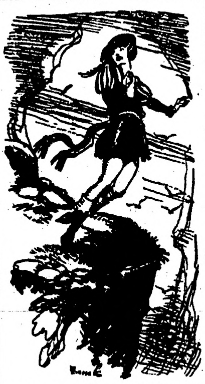
"Well, that disposes of them," said Rawson.

There were a few formalities to go through. A general agreement on the time of the murder—a few minutes before seven disposed of that, and the interrogation of Mrs. Stokes, the one eye-witness, followed.

She began well, telling the story she had told Bassett. When she described her first view of Sybil running to the edge of the Point, Rawson interrupted with a question:

"Was she running fast, as if someone was after her, as if she was frightened?"

"Yes, she was running fast, but I don't know whether she was frightened. I wasn't close enough to see anything like that, and I didn't have time to see. Just as I was looking at her the shot came."



She Staggered Along a Few Steps and Went Over.

"Did you notice the direction it came from?"

"No—it was like a sort of loud snap in the air. I heard it and she staggered along a few steps and went over."

"Did you hear any sounds—footsteps? A person makes a noise on this rocky ground."

"I didn't hear a thing." She leaned toward Rawson with haggard insistence. "I couldn't hear anything. I was stunned. Mr. Bassett asked me that and you all seem to think I ought to have heard the person—the murderer—or tried to catch him. But I hadn't any sense, I just stood there paralyzed, not grasping what had happened."

"Mr. Bassett says you went out on the rocks and tried to catch the body."

"Oh, yes. Then I came back to life. I ran down into the hollow and out on the rocks as far as I could go. And she was going by on the current—her hair and her dress all whirled about. Oh God, why was I the one to see it!"

Stokes addressed her, his voice low and urgent:

"Flora, just try to answer quietly."

She paid no attention to him, her eyes riveted on Rawson.

"And then you came back to the house?"

"Yes, but I stood there watching her for a few minutes. I don't know how long, desperate, not knowing what to do. And then I started to run back here and I fell down. I suppose I was shaking so and the rocks were slippery. I think I fell twice, but I don't know. I seemed to be half crazy."

"You saw or heard nothing on your way back?"

"No, no, I keep telling you," her voice grew higher. "I never saw anybody. If anybody was there he must have been hiding. They could have heard me—I was screaming." She turned to the others. "Wasn't I screaming?"

Bassett confirmed her statement and she went on, her voice still higher, the cords in her neck starting out:

"Of course they heard me and hid—got out of the way. Some stranger. We were all in the house, everybody here was in the house. It couldn't have been any of them."

Stokes half rose: "Flora—please!"

She turned violently on him:

"Why shouldn't I say it? I'm not afraid. I was the only person outside and it couldn't have been me." She faced round on Rawson. "Nobody could think that. Ask them—these people. They'll tell you."

"That's not at all necessary, Mrs. Stokes." Rawson was mild and suave. "Now, if you'll try to be calm—"

"Calm, calm," she groaned and bent almost double, dropping her face into her hands. Stokes got up, chalk-white in the lamplight:

"My wife's pretty well knocked out, Mr. Rawson."

"Quite understandable, Mr. Stokes. We won't trouble her any more just now. And if the rest of you ladies and gentlemen will refrain from saying what you think or offering suggestions we'll get on a good deal quicker."

They went on to Stokes, who was very clear and composed. He had walked about—down the path to the pine wood and round that end of the house. It was absolutely still and he had heard nobody. He was not sure of the direction of the shot as he had been reading a paper at the time. Like the rest of them he had had no suspicion of anything serious or, of course, he would have investigated.

Everybody else was in the house. Bassett indicated their positions, pointing them out as he explained their whereabouts.

Miss Saunders' movements followed. She had spent the earlier part of the evening sitting on the cliffs with Miss Tracy. Miss Tracy had left her some time after six, Miss Saunders saying she would follow but wanted to see the end of the sunset. No one had seen her come back but she had come back, for shortly before seven Mrs. Cornell had noticed her leaving the house.

Mrs. Cornell, invested with the grisly excitement of the hour, was eager to tell what she knew. She had been standing at the window of her room, and she saw Sybil on the path below passing the end of the balcony. Mrs. Cornell was surprised, for it was not far from supper time and Sybil was still in her Viola dress. She had not watched her, but had gone back to lock the trunk. Both she and Miss Pinkney agreed that the shot had followed soon after—about six or seven minutes they thought.

They diverged to the place of the murder, the Point. The last person who had been there was Shine, somewhere round six-thirty, though he couldn't swear to the time. He'd stayed there perhaps ten minutes, walking round, and had then gone up to the garden. As far as he could see the place was deserted. In answer to the question, had he seen anyone on his way back, he said he had seen Mrs. Stokes reading a paper on the balcony.

This ended the interrogations for the time being. The company was told they might retire to their rooms. But they were to understand that they were held on Gull island for the present, no going off on any pretext or holding communication with anyone on the mainland. Also—and Mr. Rawson was emphatic—once in their rooms they were to stay in them unless sent for by him. He did not want any wandering about in the halls or talking together.

They rose wearily and prepared to go. Stokes helped his wife to her feet and Bassett edged between the chairs toward Anne.

"How are you?" he murmured, for her appearance shocked him.

"All right. There's nothing the matter with me."

"Try to get some rest."

"Will they want us any more tonight?"

"I don't think so—not you, anyway."

Stokes and Flora moved toward the hall door, the woman limply hanging on her husband's arm. Rawson's voice arrested them:

"Mr. and Mrs. Stokes, just wait a minute. Where is your room or rooms?"

"We're together in a room on this floor out in the hall here opposite the stairs."

Old Chinese Money Had Shape of Toys

It is pretty definitely settled that the Chinese were the first to make use of the token idea in metal coins for the convenient interchange of commodities. When first working with metal money they tried to shape the metal to indicate what one could buy with it. For example, some of the early coin money was shaped like a human body. It was given this shape to indicate that it would buy clothing. Another shape was that of a modern razor—not a safety—which indicated that the coin would buy a weapon. A third shape was that of a spade.

The Chinese did not have coin shapes of sufficient variety to indicate everything in which they traded. They had a few shapes only, and the theory is that these would cover all the different articles one might wish to buy. For example, the body-shaped money would cover everything pertaining to clothing and shelter; the razor-shaped would cover all weapons, implements and tools which men use, and so on. The brass "cash" (round coin with a square hole in the middle), which has been used for 4,000 years or more, is still the common money in the interior of China.

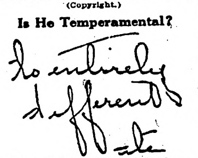
Is He Temperamental?



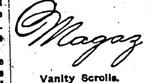
Four Different "t" Bars in One Sample.

The term "temperamental" has usually been applied to artists, actors and singers. But it can be correctly applied to anyone who has an active, creative mind.

But let us look through his writing! We will find in the writing of one who may be called temperamental very unique letter formation. Letters that impress us immediately as being different. Flowing lines are seen in conjunction with alternate points and angles. Many different angles of pitch or slant are seen. Many different t bars.

A wavy baseline will be evident—first up, then down. Signs of vanity will also be seen. High loops on the first part of the capital letter M and much underscoring of words and signatures. Emphasis will be plain, meaning the pressure of certain lines will be pronounced. Then again we may find a weak and shaky looking script with many points and angles. Variation in size of letters in the same words and a lack of firmness sometimes is seen in the writing of one who is temperamental.

Is He Proud?



Vanity Scrolls.

Confidence in His Work.

Pride is what keeps people out of the gutters. It is what makes us do things to show the world that we are capable. True pride, or self-esteem is in no way related to vanity, that distorted sense of self-satisfaction that the little fellow has too much of.

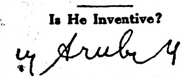
When the first part of the M is found high to a degree that is almost out of proportion and when the capital I has an oversized top, the deduction may be made that the writer is decidedly proud—almost to the point where he is vain.

When the signature is underscored with a simple line then we know that the writer is self-assured but not self-satisfied. If this underscoring has a loop wrapped about it we will immediately sense vanity.

Letters with large loops above the line and slanting backward indicate the pride of the writer.

If the writing has the appearance of being made different for effect you may be sure that a touch of vanity is intermingled with the pride of the writer.

Is He Inventive?



Inventive, If Words Are Connected.

Lacks Originality.

Will your life-partner-to-be invent ways of filling the family larder as well as excuses for forgetting your birthday? Look! His capitals will be radically different from the script that you used as a model in your school-day practice. Frequently his words will be broken in the middle and as often he will print certain letters and sometimes the whole word.

Words that are made up of a number of separated letters show keen intuition on the part of the writer.

While rounded writing does not always discourage the search for inventive ability, it is most common to find this trait in the writer who makes many angles.

Unusual terminals indicate originality and creative or inventive ability. Look for the line at the end of the word that has a slight wave in it, a sort of flowing appearance. Also note if there are any t bars that are placed entirely different from those you have found to be common.

Note.—Do not make final judgment until other signs in writing are studied.

Ancestry of Chickens

It is generally believed that the parent stock of the domestic chicken is the red jungle fowl, which inhabits northern India, the Malay peninsula, and even parts of the Philippines. The bird was first domesticated in Burma or the adjacent countries. The Chinese have a tradition that they received their fowls from the West about the year 1400 B. C.

Fight for Relics of Indian Village

The remains of a complete Indian village, perhaps one thousand years old, have recently been uncovered near Alamo, Contra Costa county, California, by Glenn Fisher and Raymond Kraft, of Concord, Calif. The discovery was made on the rim of Mount Diablo, where Bret Harte first taught school and where he was inspired to write "The Legend of Monte Diablo." A quantity of skeletal material, ornaments, weapons, utensils, shell, ashes, firestones and bone material have already been removed from the ruins. Further excavations, however, are now being held up pending legal action by the Alamo Chamber of Commerce, which is opposed to the transfer of these relics to a museum. "An Indian burial ground is its own best museum," according to Lyman K. Stoddard, president of the Alamo Chamber of Commerce, who further states that his community has one of the few intact Indian buried villages and they "are not going to let souvenir hunters carry off valuable historical material."

When All Else Failed Tanlac Came to Rescue

"Hung in a stirrup," B. L. Brigham had stomach and kidneys hurt. Asthma followed "flu attack." Health broken. Took Tanlac and passed police test

At 104½ West Main Street, Mandan, N.D., lives B. L. Brigham, whose experience of life is wide and varied. While "breaking" a horse in 1914 his stomach and kidneys were knocked out of place. "During the war I contracted 'flu' and from that developed asthma," he said. "I tried all kinds of treatments in Bismarck and Minneapolis but nothing helped me. I was told that manual work of any kind would be beyond me for all time.

"In 1920 a fellow-worker advised me to try Tanlac, since nothing else was helping. By the time I finished my fifth bottle I had improved so much that I was accepted on the Minneapolis police force, and the difficulty in breathing had left me. Tanlac made life worth living for me again and I'm now enjoying splendid health and strength."

MOREHOUSE GIVES PLAN TO PROTECT PEOPLE FROM WILD-CAT PROMOTERS

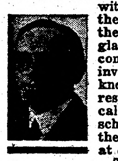
American Bankers Association Official Who Has Exposed Fraudulent Schemes for Robbing Savers Draws Up Set of Rules to Foil Crooks.

By W. R. MOREHOUSE,

Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association.

ARTICLE NO. IV

THE solution to the great problem of protecting savings depositors from losing their money in fraudulent schemes is largely in the hands of our bankers. If they will co-operate with those who save they can make it hard for these plunderers to continue business. Hasten the day when our bankers without exception will gladly welcome interviews with depositors who contemplate making investments, will urge an investigation or recommend in the stead of little-known securities investments of unquestioned responsibility. In every case where customers call at the bank excited and nervous over some scheme where by investing a few hundred dollars they expect to make thousands any banker will at once sense the situation.



W. R. Morehouse

The banker knows that the depositor is being rushed off his feet, with "Hurry, hurry and get in on the big clean-up!" and it remains for the banker to caution the depositor against such tactics. In order to prevent this all that our bankers have to do is to suggest that their customers make it a rule always to bring high-pressure salesmen to the bank to be interrogated regarding their promotions. This will break up sales nine times out of ten, for high-pressure salesmen invariably avoid being questioned too closely by bankers who know investments.

Rules to Follow

Our bankers should urge this investment slogan: "Investigate before you invest. Consult your banker first," and so indelibly impress it on the minds of their depositors that they will always be guided by their banker's advice in making investments. Salient points which should be kept before the investing depositor are:

(1) There are three cardinal points to all good investments, namely safety of principal, certainty of income and salability.

(2) Safety of principal is more important than a high yield; the promise of big returns is usually a sign of a risky speculation.

(3) It is like taking a leap in the dark to invest in promotions which are an unknown quantity and for this reason a thorough investigation should always be made.

(4) It is morally wrong, if not criminally so, for any person to invest in any proposition he feels is a skin-game, or which is tainted by trickery or fraud or opens the way for a favored few to "get in on the ground floor," clean up and get out from under before the scheme collapses. Usually the depositor finds he is not in on the ground floor, there is no chance for him to clean up before the scheme collapses and so he loses all that he has invested.

(5) If a promotion is as good as claimed, it would not be necessary for high-pressure salesmen to resort to all sorts of questionable methods, it would not be necessary to rush a victim off his feet and sign him up before he could interview his banker, but he could be given time to consult others before investing.

(6) The only reason high-pressure pirates go to those who are inexperienced in finance for funds is because they can palm off on them so-called investments which in the eyes of men of experience are valueless.

(7) The glib-talking promoter is not a true friend of the savings depositor but is a wolf in sheep's clothing, he will resort to any kind of trickery to exchange a certificate of stock for the depositor's cash, his glittering promises are fictitious and he is planning how he can entrap his victims and relieve them of their savings and not how he can make good dividends for them.

(8) For every oil well that pays dividends there are many dry holes and abandoned drilling rigs, and for every profitable mine there are many abandoned shafts, and for every successful promotion there are a thousand failures, and because of these facts the savings depositor's chance of winning is too small to justify the great risk involved

(9) Savers should steer clear of stock, shares or units in world-revolutionizing inventions which are peddled in front of empty stores or sold from house to house or through the mails.

(10) Every novice investor should remember that, as in all lines of business, black sheep have invaded the investment field. They must be shunned, while investment firms and salesmen of responsibility and integrity should be supported.

Let our banks unite in a movement designed to protect the depositor against the schemes of the wild-cat promoter—in a movement that will save our savings depositors from despair and from poverty as a result of having lost all—in a movement that will turn into legitimate investment channels the millions of dollars which are now wasted on fraudulent schemes of one kind or another. The best service a bank can render a novice investor is to keep him from making poor investments by helping him to make good ones.

YOUNG WOMEN MAY KEEP WELL

By Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Here is Proof

St. Paul, Minn.—"Here is a little advice I would like to have you put in the papers," Mrs. Jack Lorberter, of 704 Dellwood Place wrote to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company. "If young women want to keep their health and strength for the next thirty years of their lives, it is best to start in right now and take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I have tried the Compound myself and received fine results from its use." In describing her condition before taking the Compound, she writes, "I was afraid in my own house in broad daylight, I used to lock the doors and pull down the shades so that nobody could see me." One day a booklet advertising the Vegetable Compound was left on her porch and she read it through. In so doing, she found a letter from a woman whose condition was similar to her own. "I bought Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound," Mrs. Lorberter continued, "and have had fine results. My condition made me a burden to my husband. Now I ask him, "How is housekeeping?" and he says, "It is just like being in Heaven!" Are you on the Sunlit Road to Better Health?

FAMOUS MINING STRIKES

By THOMAS E. STEWARD

Search for New Mining Methods

THE government's study of the Mesabi iron district ends with 1902 and gives the shipments in that year as 13,329,953 tons of ore. Seemingly the author considered this a tremendous figure, perhaps one that would not easily be surpassed. Yet in the years of the World war Minnesota shipped as high as 45,000,000 tons of ore in one year, and duplicated that record in 1923. The iron ranges of the entire Lake Superior district, including Wisconsin and Michigan, have shipped an aggregate of 67,000,000 tons in a single year.

This is the increase of a mining industry that began in 1892 with the modest shipment of 4,245 tons from the Mesabi range, jumped to 4,275,000 tons in 1907, to 7,809,000 tons in 1900, and, as has been pointed out, to 13,329,000 in 1902, 10 years after its opening.

Notwithstanding the immense amounts of ore that have been taken from the iron mines of Minnesota, hundreds of millions of tons of high-grade ore remain.

Estimates look forward to the exhaustion of the high-grade ore supply in something like 30 years.

Meanwhile the mines experiment station at the University of Minnesota is bending all of its energies to the task of finding methods for "beneficiating" low-grade ores so that they may profitably be shipped. One method has been developed that makes it perfectly possible to use the rocklike "magnetite" ores of the eastern range, but the method is expensive and can be used only in years when the price of ore is so high that these mines can be operated at a profit. The state of Minnesota is now appropriating something like $20,000 a year for use in experiments looking to the separation of iron from low-grade ores by a roasting or "metallizing" process that could be carried on near the spot where the ore was mined. This will be important if it is developed because most of the smelters using this ore are far away, at Chicago, Gary, Cleveland, Toledo, or elsewhere. Cost of transporting the ore is great. The rich ores, some of them containing from 60 to 65 per cent in actual iron, can always be shipped, but from 45 per cent iron on down to 25 per cent iron, the ores are so lean that the shipper is paying an inordinate amount of freight on mere waste material that must be thrown away at the other end.

If the Minnesota School of Mines experiment station succeeds in accomplishing the method of "metallizing" it will add millions of dollars to the wealth that state will derive from taxes and will indefinitely prolong Minnesota's mining industry. Estimates place the supply of low-grade ores on the iron range at many billions of tons.

Spanish Strike in Arizona

THE region now known as the State of Arizona was a remote mountain area in the northern section of Spain's American possessions back in the Eighteenth century. As early as 1660 Spain had sent expeditions into the districts now known as California, New Mexico and Arizona, and some gold and silver had been found. In 1738 a remarkable deposit of silver nuggets was discovered in Arizona, but it was exhausted in three years.

The celebrated and rich silver strike in the Santa Rita mountains of Arizona, made in the year 1769, has been described in an old Spanish work entitled "Apostolic Labours of the Society of Jesus." It says:

"In the year 1769 a region of virgin silver was discovered on the frontier of the Apaches, a tribe exceedingly warlike and brave, at the place called Arizona.

"News of such surprising wealth attracted a vast multitude to the spot. At a depth of a few yards masses of fine silver of a globular form and 25 to 50 pounds in weight were found, and one lump, discovered by a government official, weighed 3,500 pounds. Many persons amassed huge fortunes, while others, equally diligent in the search, found nothing."

Under the pretense that he was acting for the safety of the treasure that had been discovered, the captain general of the district sent troops who escorted the silver train bearing this wealth to his own headquarters. When he had his hands on it he seized it in the name of the crown, claiming that it had been found on crown property. The discoverers had little liking for this procedure and appealed to the Mexican authorities at Guadalajara, but they were unwilling to take action and referred the whole matter to the royal court at Madrid. Seven years dragged by before an order came from the Spanish crown, and even then it dashed the hopes of the miners. The crown claimed the entire property and whatever it had produced.

This discouraging situation, together with repeated attacks by hostile Indians, finally put an end to mining in the Santa Rita mountains and no further important mining was done in Arizona until about 1879. Then came the silver strike at the town of Tombstone, so named, it is said, because of the frequent demand that arose for something to decorate a grave.

Object in Holding Particle of Land

What would you do if some friend died and bequeathed you a trillionth of an acre of land? You couldn't build a summer home, but you might start a microbe farm. Although land is not portioned out in such minute parcels today, transactions involving pieces of property ranging in size from a trillionth of an acre to a square inch were common in Contra Costa county, Calif., 38 years ago. The trillionth of an acre, probably the smallest piece of described land on record, was purchased at a tax sale. The land was a portion of the Tar ranch at San Pablo. The purchaser paid $24.89, which represented tax delinquency and costs of sale. The small piece of land would be merely large enough to place the point of a fine needle on. In accepting minute pieces in the center of large ranches, the bidders secured a lien which clouded the title, and were often paid well before a private sale could be transacted.—Oakland Tribune.

Cities Losing Residents

Villages and small towns are again showing increase in population, contrary to popular understanding. As a matter of fact the Institute of Social and Religious Research has found from heretofore unpublished census figures that the rate of city population increase in 1900 to 1920, fell from 84 per cent to 52.1 per cent, while the rural rate was pushed up to 20.7 per cent.

The discrepancy is due to government bookkeeping, according to Robert McCulluch who made a study for the survey. The government automatically changes a town or village to a city when it reaches 2,500 population.

RESIDENT ANGLING LICENSES ARE OUT

Minnesota Fisherman Must Obtain and Carry Permits With Them.

County auditors throughout the state have received from the Game and Fish department the new resident angling licenses and permits which are required of all resident anglers more than 21 years old.

They must be obtained from the auditor or the agents appointed by him in the county in which the applicant resides, and they must be carried on the person of the licensee at all times while fishing or while going to or returning from fishing waters.

The individual resident angling license fee is 50 cents, but the head of a family or household, by paying a fee of $1, may obtain additional permits for all the members of his family or household more than 21 years old without additional cost. No license or permit is required of resident anglers under 21 years old.

All licenses and permits are issued for the calendar year.

Contrary to a report which has been circulated widely, particularly outside of Minnesota, there is no increase in the non-resident angling license fee, which is $3.

Licensed non-residents are extended all the privileges of resident anglers while in this state, and they are permitted to ship or transport 24 pounds of undressed fish to their homes. Transportation coupons, attached to the license, enable the licensee to make three separate shipments of eight pounds each. It should be noted these coupons must be executed in ink.

Non-residents under 16 years old may take fish without procuring a license to do so provided the parent or guardian of such minor shall have obtained and has in his or her possession a non-resident angling license. Fish taken by such unlicensed minor, however, may not be shipped or transported out of the state.

There are no changes in the catch and size limit provisions relating to game fish, nor in open seasons except in relation to trout in Lake and Cook counties. There the trout season opens May 25 and closes September 1, whereas elsewhere in Minnesota the trout season opens April 15, and closes August 15.

The zone law relating to bass, rock bass, crappies and sunfish is still in force. In the Southern zone the season on these species opens May 29, and in the Northern zone June 21. The zone boundary crosses the state on a line approximately from Browns Valley through Sauk Rapids and St. Cloud to Princeton and Cambridge.

SCHOOL NOTES

The pupils of the third and fourth grades received a letter from Florence Ordahl who left school about two weeks ago. They are answering her letter this week. They certainly were glad to receive such an interesting letter.

The fifth grade has been writing poems about spring. They have several very good poems now completed. Perhaps you would like to read some of them. How's this

THE RAIN

The rain is hid in the winter
And back in the spring it comes
It stays all the rest of the summer
Then no more rain will come.

The next year in the spring time
The rain will come again
It softens up the dark black soil
And the trees look bright again.

By Gladys Sanoden.

The sixth grade are writing a play. They are taking the story "The Old Fashioned School" told in reading class by Esther Ordahl, and are dividing it into the following scenes:

Scene I-Outside the schoolhouse.
Scene II-Inside, the same day.
Scene III-The next day.

The seventh grade history class are making an outline of the thirteen colonies. The following topics were considered under each colony: Date, place, motive, settlers, and government.

The seventh and eighth grade drawing class are working on a drawing of the school-house and yards. Different way in which the building may be improved and also the yard, are studied in connection with the drawing.

The eighth grade history class are studying recent American History. Newspapers, magazines and current periodicals are used for references.

Morning inspection in the primary grades now consists of an examination by the monitors of the neatness of the hair, the cleanliness of the face, hands, neck, ears, and nails. Each child must have a clean handkerchief.

The primary grades received a three page letter from Gordon Ellestad. They have answered and three of their letters have been sent to him at Spring Grove, Minnesota.

There are a number of grammatical correct signs about the first and second grade room. Each sign does not hold an austere appearence to the children since the became acquainted with the cards by means of a game.

The first and second grades are furnishing a doll house. The furniture is constructed on a scale of one inch per foot.

COMMENCEMENT HERE ON JUNE 2

Rev. S. L. Tallakson To Give The Address.

The graduation exercises for both the graduates of the high school and the eighth grade will take place in the local school auditorium on June 2. Rev. S. L. Tallakson of Thief River Falls has been secured to give the commencement address, it was announced this week by Supt. R. J. Vieths of the local school.

For a time it was doubtful whether the exercises would be held this year or not, because of the unusually small graduating class, as there are only three high school graduates this year, those finishing the course being Myrtle Reierson, Ernest Raaum, and Maybelle Thompson.

The local high school will close its regular classwork on Thursday, May 26, since on the next day—Friday, May 27—the Minnesota State Final Examinations will begin and will continue till Thursday, June 2.

E. M. Bennes of Thief River visited here on Wednesday with his brother, Albert Bennes.

HOUSE PAINT

A simple test that proves the economy of good paint. A given quantity of good paint covers 25% to 50% more surface than the same quantity of poor paint.

Good Paint Costs Less!

IT'S a fact—good paint actually costs you less to use than poor paint. A low price per gallon on poor paint is deceiving because it takes more gallons to cover a given surface and then you haven't got a job that will protect as well or last as long as good paint.

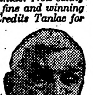
Retired Farmer Beats "Flu" at 76

Chas. E. West, run down by bronchitis and "flu" lost 43 pounds and grew steadily weaker. All remedies failed to help till he tried Tanlac. Now eating well as ever, feeling fine and winning back lost weight. Credits Tanlac for great help.



Mr. West retired from farming 20 years ago and lives at the Alis Hotel, Devils Lake, N. D. His health remained robust until June, 1926, when bronchitis developed, followed by "flu." "I coughed continually," said Mr. West, "and lost weight rapidly. In a little while I lost 43 pounds and grew steadily weaker. My diet for three months consisted of raw eggs and milk.

"Mr. Moran, of the Ramsey Drug Co., advised me to try Tanlac and I'll say that after three days I could feel my old hearty appetite returning. I'm still taking Tanlac, have gained 20 lbs. in weight and feel my strength improving every day. I'm really fine for 76 and give due praise to Tanlac."

Your druggist has Tanlac. Get a bottle today and let it help you back to health and strength. Over 52,000,000 bottles sold.

Time-Saving Way of Tinting

(Copyright 1937)

For perfect tinting of dainty underwear, dresses, etc., the easiest way—and by far the best way—is the use of real dye. It tints in cold water, you know; just dip the garment and it takes whatever tinge you wish to give it. A matter of minutes.

Real dyes will get such smooth and even tones as shame the streaky, wishy-washy work of synthetic preparations for the purpose! Diamond dye in original powder form is only fifteen cents at the drug store. Do your own diluting. Then dip to tint—and you'll have an effect that's beautiful. And if you want the tint permanent, just use boiling water!

Diamond dyes do a perfect, "professional" job of dyeing, too; the druggist has sample shades and simple directions. For a book of endless suggestions, in full color, request a free copy of Color Craft of DIAMOND DYES, Dept N32, Burlington, Vermont.

The Leading Lady

By GERALDINE BONNER

WNU Service
(Copyright by The Bobbs-Merrill Co.)

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it. To Anne he betrays his enmity toward Sybil. Stokes tells Sybil he has news of Dallas, and to secure privacy they arrange to meet in a small summer house. Flora Stokes tells Bassett she saw Sybil shot but did not see her murderer. Bassett notified the sheriff, Abel Williams. The latter suspects Flora Stokes.

CHAPTER V—Cantinued

—9—

"I'd rather Mrs. Stokes went up to the second floor." He turned to Bassett. "You have space up there, I suppose?"

"Space!" It came from Miss Pinkney before Bassett had time to answer—these hirelings of the law did not realize where they were. "We've put up more people here than you could get into one of those flea-bitten hotels up your way."

"Take her things up there. You help her."

Flora turned stricken eyes on her husband. He said nothing but very gently loosened her fingers on his arm. They trailed away, Miss Pinkney stalking ahead. Mrs. Cornell and Anne made their exit by the opposite door. Both were silent as they climbed the stairs. Mrs. Cornell's door opened and closed on her, and Anne fared on to hers on the side stretch of the gallery. She looked down into the lighted room, saw Shine move toward the entrance, heard his voice, loud and startled:

"Why, there's someone down by the dock!"

The other men wheeled sharply, on the alert. She stopped, head bent, listening.

"Patrick—the d—d fool." It was Williams. "Told to watch the causeway and standing up there like a lighthouse."

"Oh, it's your man. I'll go down and tell him." Shine wanted to help all he could before his retirement to the butler's bedroom. "He ought to be where he won't show, is that it?"

"Yes, tell him to stow his carcass somewhere out of sight. He ain't there to advertise the fact he's on guard."

"If he gets in the shadow under the roof of the boathouse," said Bassett, "he can command the whole length of it and not be seen from either side."

"That's the dope. The neck of this bottle's the causeway and it's going to be corked good and tight tonight."

Anne's door closed without a sound. The three men turned back from the entrance. "Is that woman gone upstairs yet?" Rawson murmured to his assistant as Williams stepped to the middle of the room and watched the gallery. He continued to watch it till Flora and Miss Pinkney appeared and finally were shut away behind their several doors, then he looked at Rawson and nodded.

"Now," said the district attorney to Bassett. "I want you to show me where that pistol was."

Bassett indicated the desk:

"In the third drawer of the desk. Miss Pinkney is certain it was there this morning."

"And you know it wasn't there when you looked after the shooting?" Rawson went to the desk as he spoke.

"I can swear it wasn't."

Rawson pulled out the drawer and thrust in his hand.

"Well, it's here now," he said, and drew out a revolver.

He held it toward them on his palm. They stared at it, for the moment too surprised for comment. Rawson broke it open; there was one empty chamber.

"Can we get into some room where there's more privacy than this place?" he said. "I want some more talk with you, Mr. Bassett."

Bassett directed them to the library. He put out the living room lights and followed them.

CHAPTER VI

Bassett was prepared for what he had to tell. During the long wait for the officers of the law his mind had been ranging over it, shaking bare from unnecessary detail the chain of events that had ended in murder. It was impossible to conceal the situation between Sybil and the Stokeses; he could not if he had wished it, and he did not wish it. A girl had been brutally done to death, a girl innocent of any evil intention, and his desire to bring her murderer to justice was as strong as either Williams' or Rawson's. And they could get the facts better from him than from the muddled stories of the others, their minds clouded by prejudice and hearsay. He hoped that what he said would be coldly unbiased, the naked truth as he knew it. That his revelations would involve a woman whom he liked and pitied would not induce him to withhold what ought to be known. Chivalry had no place in this great drama.

Sitting by the desk in the library he evelled the situation, what he had heard, seen and knew. The men gave an unwinking attention, now and then stopping him to plant a question. The trend of Williams' thoughts was soon revealed—he suspected Flora Stokes. When the matter was thrashed out he came to an open admission with the remark:

"Well, you have only one person here who had the provocation necessary to commit murder."

Bassett made no answer. If his duty required him to tell all he knew, it did not require him to give his own opinions.

Rawson, who was smoking, his long, loose-jointed frame slouched down in an armchair, took his cigar from his mouth:

"Of course the woman's the first person you'd think of. She had the necessary provocation and the state of mind. But the way she came in and told them—as Mr. Bassett describes it—doesn't look to me like a guilty person."

"Why not?"

"Sounds too genuine, too like real excitement."

"Don't you think it's natural to get excited if you've killed someone?"

"Yes, but not just that way."

Williams leaned over the arm of his chair:

"You got to remember something about these people, Rawson—and it counts big—they're all actors."

Bassett spoke up quickly:

"No, she wasn't acting. You'd have known that if you'd seen her. What

And the Boat—the Boat With Only Gabriel in It.

she did was natural—a woman suffering from a fearful shock."

"Couldn't an actor put that on?"

"Yes, some could, but I'm certain she wasn't."

"When Stokes came into the room after the shot," said Rawson, "how did he behave?"

"He seemed all right. But I can't honestly say that I noticed him much."

"Oh, rubbish!" Williams made a rolling motion in the scoop of the big chair. "You can't suspect the man; he was in love with her. He didn't want to kill her, he wanted to keep her alive."

"Men do kill the women they love, especially when they can't get her."

"Yes, they do. I've known of such cases. But that's impulse. This was premeditated." The sheriff pointed at the revolver lying on the desk. "Some time to day somebody located that gun, took it for a purpose—not to shoot seagulls as you thought, Mr. Bassett."

Rawson looked at the pistol:

"Premeditation, all right. Was there anybody in the outfit who didn't know you'd opened that drawer and found the revolver gone?"

Bassett considered:

"Stokes didn't know. He came in after I'd shut the drawer. I didn't speak of it because just as I'd got through asking him if he'd seen anyone, we heard Mrs. Stokes' scream."

"And she didn't, of course," commented Williams.

"While you were running round at the point the house was empty?"

"I think Mrs. Stokes was here all the time. I never saw her outside."

"Any of the others come up?"

"I'm not certain of all of them. I know Shine did; I sent him back to phone over to Hayworth for the boats. And Stokes did, he came up for the electric torch when I was in here telephoning to you."

"Then neither of them knew the loss of the revolver had been discovered and they had plenty of opportunity to return it to the desk?"

Bassett nodded, and after a minute's cogitation Rawson went on:

"Doesn't it seem odd to you that no one saw Miss Saunders when she came back to the house?"

"No. They were all in their rooms, except Shine, who was down at the Point, and Mrs. Stokes, who was reading on the balcony. I asked her particularly if she'd noticed Sybil pass and she said no, she'd been interested in her book and wouldn't have noticed anybody."

"I'd give a good deal to know what Miss Saunders did in that time. I think it would let in some light."

"How so?"

Rawson narrowed his eyes in contemplation of an unfolding line of thought:

"Well, what took her out again to the Point after she'd come in? She hadn't a good deal of time and she wanted to change her clothes before supper. It looks to me as if she met someone in the house, someone who wanted her to go down there with them."

"Mrs. Cornell says she was alone."

"She might have started alone and gone to meet them."

"Then it couldn't have been Stokes," said Williams, "for Mr. Bassett says she wouldn't speak to him if she could help it."

"That's right," Bassett nodded in agreement. "She'd never have made a date with him. She shunned him like the plague. If you knew her you wouldn't see anything in that going out. She was restless and unhappy and the place here—the sea, the views—fascinated her. It was our last evening and it was like her not to want to miss any of it, slip out for a minute to enjoy the end of it."

"And came upon someone waiting for her—lying in wait and—"

Rawson did not finish. A thud and crackling crash came from the living room. The three men rose with a simultaneous leap and ran for the door.

CHAPTER VII

Of all the people gathered in the house that evening Anne had been the most silent. Her ravaged face, the contours broken by gray hollows, bearing the stamp of shock and horror, had been unnoticed among the other faces. Now and then a pitying glance had been directed to her, grief as Sybil's friend must have added a last unbearable poignancy to the tragedy.

After her question to Flora her mind had seemed to blur and cease to function. She had run from the house not knowing what she did, gone hither and thither with the others, looking, speaking, listening in a blind daze. It was not till they returned to the living room that her faculties began to clear and co-ordinate.

Her thoughts circled round the image of Joe as she had last seen him—the vision of him as someone strange and sinister. And the boat—the boat with only Gabriel in it—it kept coming up like a picture revolving on a wheel—going and returning, going and returning. Had he stayed, and what for? That question revolved with the picture of the boat.

She thought of telling Bassett and gave that up—with the police expected she could not get him alone, and why add to his burden with her suspicions? Yes, that was what it was—nothing but a suspicion. She had no certainty; Joe might have been in the boat, Joe might have got off the island some other way. Tomorrow something might come to light that would make these hideous fancies seem like the dreams of delirium. That was the state of mind she tried to maintain when she went upstairs and overheard a man was on guard at the causeway.

Few Have Ever Found Humming Birds' Nest

Comparatively few people ever have the pleasure of peeping into a humming bird's nest, to behold two tiny eggs like round white beans, or to see two birdlets which somewhat resemble little beetles.

In the first place, the nest is so small and so resembles the surrounding shrubbery that it is easily overlooked. Then, too, it is so cleverly hidden by its wise builders and so disguised in its construction as to require an experienced eye to discover it.

Built of soft, pliant hairs and adorned with bits of moss and feathers, it forms a downy, cuplike, secluded home. The fairy hummer of Cuba, the smallest of all the humming birds, builds a nest so tiny that it can be covered completely with a copper cent. Its eggs look like two little pearls.

The humming bird, more than 500 species of which have been classified, is distinctly American. In the main, it is a tropical bird, as fewer than 20 species are found in the United States.

The one known to residents of states east of the Mississippi is the beautiful ruby throat. Audubon called humming birds "glittering fragments of the rainbow," so gorgeous are they in color.

Novel Club

The members of the "Asparagus club" call themselves a "bunch," but they are hardly that because they are scattered all over the United States and Canada, with a member in London and another in Odenburgh. The members are connected directly or indirectly with the grocery business and it originated among delegates on a train bound for the national convention of the Association of Retail Grocers in May, 1909. It was decided to call it the "Asparagus club," because asparagus is connected with the grocery business and naturally suggests a closely bound "bunch." Then each member was dubbed a "tip."

Small patches of quack grass can be killed by covering it with tar paper, building paper or other material which will exclude all light, according to A. A. Hansen, Purdue university. He states that Fred Dannes of Lake county, Ind., completely eradicated a patch of quack grass by covering it with tar paper for three months. STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

On How to Lose Your Inheritance

"It is so hard for me to get along on what John left me," complained Mrs. Norris to Aunt Emmy. "Junior wants to get a job, but I always wanted him to go to college—"

"Yes, yes, I know," interrupted Aunt Emmy, "but what about this mining stock?"

"I'm coming to that. You see I thought I could invest some of those bonds John left, they yield such a tiny income, in something that would bring real money. I needed more money, so when the telephone rang that day and a man, he had the nicest voice, said he had been referred to me by a friend and wanted to talk over some gilt-edged investments, I told him to come right up.

"His name was Mr. Stanhope. He was so nice. He told me all about the big money people are making in platinum mines. Platinum jewelry is so fashionable now. He said he could let me have some stock in a wonderful mine, and that the company would buy the stock back if I ever wanted my money."

"Have you a statement signed by one of the officers of the mining company to the effect that the company will repurchase your stock?" asked Aunt Emmy.

"Why so—"

"Well, you will have trouble getting your money back. A company cannot be compelled to buy its own stock back."

"Oh, I don't know. Anyhow, I got out my bonds and showed them to him—"

"What, you keep your bonds in the house instead of at the bank!" exclaimed Aunt Emmy.

"Why, yes, but in a box that locks—and Mr. Stanhope said that he was surprised that a woman with the good business judgment I had should be getting such a small income as those bonds paid— scarcely anything. He said that I should make my money work harder for me. He knew I must have good business judgment, he said, because I brought my children up so beautifully. He offered to take the bonds and change them for his stock."

"Oh, Lord!" exclaimed Aunt Emmy, "did he give you a receipt?"

"Why, of course, he was the nicest man. But Junior said after he left that he didn't like him. He said he looked slick. Boys are so funny. Well, I got the platinum stock but Mr. Barnes at the bank says it's no good. He must be mistaken. But I want my bonds back so I came to you for help. And you're always so lucky about your investments."

"Not lucky, just sensible," corrected Aunt Emmy. "Why, oh why, don't you consult your banker, who understands finance before you risk your money? This is not your first loss. Remember that piece of land you bought that was under water?"

"That was different," said Mrs. Norris blushing, "and anyway, Mr. Stanhope is honest, I can tell that."

"If he were honest, he would not have promised you the things he promised. Reputable houses don't send out representatives who make promises about repurchase of stock. Why don't you 'phone your Mr. Stanhope?"

"I did, but he's out of town. I've written, too, but I suppose I shall have to wait until he gets back. It's been several weeks now, so he should be back soon."

Just then the evening paper came. Aunt Emmy glanced at it, then read it attentively. Her expression grew serious. She handed the paper to Mrs Norris. On the front page was an account of a financial scandal. The house that sold Mrs. Norris her mining stock was involved and the men who ran the business had been indicted for fraud.—A. B. Aymes.

Sun's Pathway Differs

The naval observatory says the more rapid rising and setting of the sun at the equator is not due to the greater circumference of the earth at that point, but to the fact that at the equator the sun rises and sets in a path perpendicular to the horizon, while in all other latitudes this path is inclined from the perpendicular.

WE HAVE TO OUTLIVE THE BEANSTALK

Jack's famous beanstalk is reputed to have grown to enormous proportions overnigt—but it wasn't a permanent institution.

We do not believe in this system of development. Our business is permanent—we are building forever. The interests of this Company are inseparably linked with the interests of this community.

Your progress is our progress, your prosperity is our prosperity, the same factors which affect each one of you affect us.

A public utility service such as ours is inherently a part of the community it serves. This is true of us to a greater extent than in the case of the merchant, the lawyer, the doctor, or almost any other citizen. If business is bad in one section, the merchant, the salesman, the professional man, might even pick up and move to greener pastures. We are here to stay.

We can only grow as the community we serve grows. It's easy to see why we are local boosters.

A car for every purse and purpose

THIS YEAR the General Motors line is an imposing Automobile Show in itself. Here is every style of body. Every type of design — four cylinder, six cylinder, eight cylinder. Every improvement. Every price, from the Chevrolet touring car at $510 to the Cadillac with special coach work at $9,000. A car for every purse and purpose.

Every one of the models now on display is different and distinguished. Yet two unifying characteristics bind them all together:

1 EVERY CLOSED BODY is by Fisher. The quality of all body workmanship is Fisher quality, and because Fisher is owned by General Motors, every resource has been utilized to make body and chassis a perfect quality unit.

2 EVERY MODEL has shared in the advantages of General Motors research, purchasing standards and Proving Ground tests; and in the economies of volume production. Dollar for dollar you will buy more value in the car you select because of General Motors quality and the public's purchase of more than 1,200,000 General Motors cars last year.

THE GENERAL MOTORS line is a direct result of the record-breaking patronage accorded by the public in 1926. The economies which this great volume afforded have been passed on to the car purchaser in even better quality. With great pride we invite you to inspect these new General Motors cars and to make one or more of them your own.

Meanwhile Madonna Fulvia had been conducted to the Communal. A guard was placed outside the door, and another was set to pace beneath her window; but at least she was given the freedom of that spacious chamber, and of course Mario was admitted to her presence, since he was to be her messenger to Matteo Orsini. The duke had judged it well that it should be so, since to the testimony of such letters as she might write Mario would add the confirmation of his own evidence of a fact which might be disbelieved if related by another.

Alone with his mistress, this frail child whom he had known from her cradle, the old servant now broke down utterly. His grimness deserted him utterly, and the tears rolled down his ghastly furrowed face.

"Madonna mine! Madonna mine!" he sobbed brokenly, and held out his old arms as if he would have taken her to them, paternally to comfort her. "I warned you. I told you here was no work for such gentleness as yours. I implored you to let me do this thing in your stead. What do I matter? I am old; my life has reached its evening; my loss of a few days more would be nobody's gain. But you—Oh God of Pity!"

"Calm, Mario! Be calm," she bade him gently.

"Calm?" he cried. "Can I be calm when before you lies the choice between betrayal and death, and, Gesu! such a death. Had I carried an arbalest I should have put a bolt through his devil's heart when he pronounced your doom; the fiend, the monster!"

"A beautiful devil he is," she said. Then she dropped her voice. "Mario!" She called him softly. Her eyes flashed to the door, then she drew still farther from it, over to the window overlooking the square, beckoning him to follow. He went silently, staring, impressed by the mystery of her bearing.

By the window, in lowered, murmuring accents she addressed him.

"There may yet be a way out of this," she said. "You shall bear no letters, because you will need none. Listen now." And she gave him her commands.

By the time she had done he was staring at her, his jaw fallen. Then he stirred himself out of his amazement. He broke into protests that she was but making her ruin doubly certain; he sought to dissuade her, reminded her that it was, through a disregard of his counsels that she came into her present ghastly pass, and besought her not again to disregard them.

But in her headstrong way she remained unmoved, her resolve a rock upon which the torrent of his loving eloquence broke and was dissipated. And so in the end she had her way with him against his better judgment, even as last night.

"And to my lord? What shall I say to my lord?" he asked.

"As little as you can, and nothing to alarm him."

"I am to lie, then."

"Even that if need be, out of charity to him."

He departed at last, and throughout the long afternoon she sat alone in that room of the mezzanine, save for one interruption when a couple of slender vermilion striplings of the duke's household brought her food and wine in golden vessels upon salvers of beaten gold.

She sat on by the window, and toward evening she saw the duke returning with his gay cavalcade. Later, as the twilight was deepening, the two vermilion pages returned to bid her in the duke's name to the supper that was spread below. She excused herself. But the pages were gently insistent.

Perceiving not only the uselessness of further denial, but, further, that her very presence below might advance the thing she had set herself to do, she rose and signed to the pages to lead the way. In the corridor another pair awaited her, each bearing a lighted taper, who went on ahead. In this ceremonious fashion was she conducted below to the great hall, where a courtly crowd of cavaliers and ladies were assembled, making her instantly conscious—very woman that she was—of her own plain and dusty raiment, so out of place amid all this glittering splendor.

The duke himself, tall and graceful in a suit of sulphur-colored silk with silver bands at throat and waist, advanced to the foot of the stairs to receive her, bowing to her with the deference he might have used to a princess. By the hand, which she did not dream of denying him, he led her through the throng to the double doors that were thrown open upon an inner room. Here long tables were set for supper upon a dais that formed the three sides of a parallelogram.

From a fretted gallery above the doorway came a sound of lutes, archlutes, and viols, and under cover of the music—his voice so melodious that it almost seemed to sing to it—the duke addressed her.

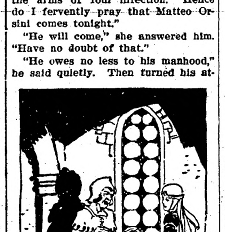
"I rejoice for you, Madonna," he said, "that here is spread no nuptial feast."

She looked at him, and shivered slightly as she turned away again.

"It would break my heart," he pursued on that murmuring, caressing note of his that lent his voice a wooing quality, "it would break my heart to see so much beauty delivered into the arms of foul infection. Hence do I fervently pray that Matteo Orsini comes tonight."

"He will come," she answered him. "Have no doubt of that."

"He owes no less to his manhood," he said quietly. Then turned his attention to more immediate matter. "You do not eat," he reproved her.



He Broke Into Protests.

"I should choke, I think," she answered frankly.

"A cup of wine at least," he urged, and signed to a cellarer who bore a gold vessel of soft Puglia wine. But, seeing her gesture of refusal, he put forth a hand to stay the servant's pouring. "Wait," he said, and beckoned a page to him. "A moss-agate cup for Madonna Fulvia, here," he bade the stripling, and the page vanished upon his errand.

Madonna's lip curled a little. "There is no need for the precaution," she said—for moss-agate cups were said to burst if poison touched them—"I neither suspect venom nor do I fear it."

"So much I might have known," he answered, "since you have displayed yourself so subtly learned in the uses of it."

He spoke quietly and gravely, but at the words she felt herself go hot and cold at once. A scarlet wave suffused her face, then ebbed, to leave it deathly pale. His words made her perhaps realize that she had no just cause for grievance; she was a poisoner caught flagrante, and the steely treatment he meted out to her in his silken fashion was no more than her desert.

Back came the page with the gleaming moss-agate cup, which he set down before her. The waiting cellarer brimmed it at a sign from him, and his glance now inviting her she drank to steady her sudden weakness.

But the meats they placed before her continued unheeded, nor did she thereafter heed the duke when he leaned aside to mock her still with that dread gentleness of his. Her staring eyes were set expectantly upon the doors at the room's end. It waxed late, and her impatience mounted. Why did they not come, and thus put an end to the unbearable strain of suspense that racked her very soul?

Came pages now with silver basins, ewers, and napkins. Gallants and ladies dipped their hands and washed their fingers against the serving of the sweetmeats, and then without warning—but obeying, no doubt, the orders that the duke had left—those portals upon which Madonna's eyes had so long been fastened swung open, and between two men-at-ar in steel she beheld her clay-faced equerry, the faithful Mario, haggard and dust-stained, returned at last.

When All Else Failed Tanlac Came to Rescue

"Hung in a stirrup," B. L. Brigham had stomach and kidneys hurt. Asthma followed "flu attack." Health broken. Took Tanlac and passed police test

At 104½ West Main Street, Mandan, N.D., lives B. L. Brigham, whose experience of life is wide and varied. While "breaking" a horse in 1914 his stomach and kidneys were knocked out of place. "During the war I contracted 'flu' and from that developed asthma," he said. "I tried all kinds of treatments in Bismarck and Minneapolis but nothing helped me. I was told that manual work of any kind would be beyond me for all time.

"In 1920 a fellow-worker advised me to try Tanlac, since nothing else was helping. By the time I finished my fifth bottle I had improved so much that I was accepted on the Minneapolis police force, and the difficulty in breathing had left me. Tanlac made life worth living for me again and I'm now enjoying splendid health and strength."

PANCAKES RARE ON ENGLISH MENU

Appears Only as Special Delicacy for Dessert.

London, England.—The lowly pancake may be a popular breakfast dish in the United States, where it is eaten by the half-dozen at one sitting, but here in England it is a rare delicacy to be eaten singly as dessert at the end of one's dinner.

At the Cheshire Cheese, the famous London inn, which was once the gathering place for Doctor Johnson and his erudite circle, and now is a center for American tourists, the distinction is the cause of constant difficulty.

A pancake-hungry American came to the old inn for luncheon recently. As he glanced over the menu the word, or what he thought was the word "pancake," struck his eye.

"I'll have half a dozen of these," he confided to the waiter, briskly.

"Half a dozen pancakes, sir?" said the waiter in a polite surprise, elevating his eyebrows slightly.

"Sure, that ought to hold me for a while, I guess. I'll probably come back for more later."

The six pancakes appeared and disappeared. In due course the bill likewise appeared. The American looked and his jaw dropped.

"Six shillings for six pancakes! That's a mistake, isn't it?"

"Oh, no, sir," said the waiter, and pointed to the menu, where in old English type was printed: "Ye pancake, 1 shilling."

The American paid, but as he went out, he sputtered to a friend:

"A dollar and a half for six pancakes! Next thing you know we'll be eating baked beans at a shilling ye bean."

Oldest Public Library in West at Madison, Ind.

Madison, Ind.—The first public library in the Northwest territory, established 109 years ago in a wayside inn along the Ohio river, ministers today to the community which has grown up around it.

Across the Appalachians and down the river to southern Indiana a group of men of learning came soon after 1810.

Led by Alexander Meek, attorney, they formed a circulating library for mutual exchange of books. In 1818 the men of the hamlet met at the inn and formed there a public library of voluntarily contributed books.

Twenty-four subscribers paid $5 apiece in its first year for borrowing privileges. It outgrew quarters in the inn, moved to a store, and after the Civil war became a county enterprise.

To day it occupies an entire floor of the Masonic temple. Its shelves still hold most of the worn and rare volumes which started it—notably a French atlas published in Amsterdam in 1733.

Former Royal Yacht Hauls Vegetable Cargo

Oakland, Calif.—Ripening vegetables and fruits are brought to local markets from Mexican west coast ports on a yacht that formerly belonged to the king of Spain. The boat is the Camina, built on the Clyde 30 years ago for a Scotch millionaire. It was purchased by the Spanish crown for the king and remained in his service many years. The United States government acquired it during the World war and later sold it to Capt. Ralph Gaertner.

The Camina's partitions and lockers were ripped out to make room for freight, but the richly carved sideboard still does duty in the mess room and the crew eats off a hand-made oak table.

Moose Makes Himself Captive in Snow Zoo

Anchorage, Alaska.—The Alaskan railroad now boasts a zoo. The menagerie was thrust upon the organization and there appears no way to get rid of the extra burden but to declare war and use gunfire.

It happened at Tunnel, where the road maintains a gigantic hole, known as the gravel pit. Into this snow-covered, innocent-looking clearing walked a large bull moose not yet relieved of its antlers. He floundered and floundered about in the loose snow until he tramped out a pit whose high wall prevented all exit. When men approach he charges at them with the arrow-pointed shovels. He exhausted the crop of willows for food and railroaders have been hauling hay to him. How to get the moose, declared by every one as the largest ever seen in the North, out of its dilemma uninjured is a problem.

'BLOOD RAINS' FAIL TO FRIGHTEN FRENCH

Phenomenon No Longer Is Cause of Terror.

Paris.—A few days ago a shower of red rain fell at many places in southern and central France. It is significant of the progress of popular enlightenment that, although the event was generally described in the French press as a "shower of blood," this phrase was used in a conventional and not a literal sense. No attempt appears to have been made in any quarter to invest the phenomenon with a miraculous or mysterious character, and no superstitious fears appear to have been aroused by its occurrence.

Times have changed. Among the so-called prodigies recorded in ancient and medieval chronicles, none are more frequently mentioned than strange showers, of one sort or another, which alarmed mankind not only on account of their apparently supernatural character, but also because they were regarded as portents of coming wars and other calamities. The catalogue of things alleged to have fallen in these showers is a long one. It includes fishes, frogs, rats, mice, serpents, insects, grain, honey, manna, sulphur, ink, milk and—most frequently of all—blood.

Homer and Virgil Mention Them.

Stories of bloody rain are related by Homer, Virgil and several Roman historians. Plutarch speaks of showers of blood following great battles and asserts that bloody vapors, distilled from the bodies of the slain, impregnated the clouds, from which they were subsequently shed on the earth.

Gregory of Tours declared that a shower of blood fell over Paris in the year 482 A. D., when "many people had their clothes stained with it and cast them off in terror." The same phenomenon was observed at Brescia for three days and three nights before the death of Pope Adrian II in the year 872. Another three-day shower of blood is said to have occurred in France and Germany in March, 1181.

In 1669 one of these "blood rains" took place at Chatillon-sur-Seine. "There fell in various parts of the town," says the "History of the Academy of Sciences," "a sort of rain, or reddish liquid, thick, viscous, and foul smelling, which resembled a rain of blood. The prints of great drops of it were observed on walls; it was this fact that led to the belief that this rain was made of stagnant, muddy water raised by a whirlwind from some pond in the neighborhood."

Although the nonmiraculous nature of red rains was thus suspected at a comparatively early date, they continued to be a sources of terror to the ignorant majority of Europeans until a generation or so ago, while even in scientific circles some curiously erroneous notions concerning them prevailed down to the middle or latter part of the Nineteenth century.

Wind-borne Material.

Microscopic examination showed that the rain was reddened with earth, or mineral material, but the source of this material remained for a long time uncertain. It is now well recognized that the falls of colored rain and also of dry dust that occur at rather frequent intervals in southern and central Europe are due, in most cases, to wind-borne material blown up from the Sahara desert.

Several cases in which enormous quantities of solid matter have been carried great distances by the winds have formed the subject of elaborate investigations on the part of meteorologists.

Thus during the three days, March 8 to 10, 1901, heavy dust storms occurred in the deserts of southern Algeria, and the sequel of these storms was carefully studied by Hellmann and Meinardus. A widespread cyclonic storm, centered over Tunis at the time, sucked up the dust, which was carried northward by the winds at high altitudes.

Deposits from this dust cloud occurred over an area extending as far as 2,500 miles from the place of origin. Reports collected from hundreds of observers indicated that 1,800,000 tons of dust fell over the continent of Europe, and one-third of this fell north of the Alps.

As much more is believed to have fallen over the Mediterranean, while on the African coast itself the deposit is supposed to have amounted to 150,000,000 tons.

Dick Whittington's Cat Called Myth by Mayor

London.—History won't vouch for a cat that has charmed children for centuries, Sir Rowland Blades, lord mayor of London, shocked traditionalists by announcing in a speech here. The cat which is supposed to have brought his predecessor, Sir Richard Whittington, fame and fortune never existed, Blades declared.

The lord mayor said he had been seaching the records and had failed to find any contemporary reference to the cat. The story of Dick Whittington's cat, he added, has been traced to an Austrian source two centuries later and truth must prevail over sentiment.

'SUCKER' WINS BET BUT LOSES $5,000

Alabama Man Taken in by Confidence Men.

Birmingham, Ala.—Birmingham detectives are looking for two confidence men, said to be from New York, who swindled Alexander B. Lischkoff, Birmingham real estate broker, out of $5,000 cash.

The game played by these men is a new one in this section of the country. The two men met Lischkoff accidentally on the street. They talked of a business deal. An engagement was made for the three to meet at a downtown hotel that afternoon.

At the time stated all three sat in a hotel room and talked business. "The two men bet me $100 I could not raise $5,000 in several minutes," Lischkoff said. "Well, I went down to the bank to prove it to them. I got the money and was back at the room in less than ten minutes. 'Well, you win,' said one of the men. 'Now you ought to buy the cigars.'

"Sure, I'll buy a whole box," replied Lischkoff with glee as he jumped up and left his $5,000 on the table in the room and ran for the smokes.

A few minutes later Lischkoff returned with the cigars. His two friends were gone. So was his $5,000.

A checkup at the bank revealed that Lischkoff made a note for the $5,000, giving as security his savings account.

The two confidence men were registered at the hotel as Joe Singer and S. Rosen, New York city.

When asked what he would do if he had his $5,000 back Lischkoff said: "I'd buy $3,000 worth of locks and lock the other $2,000 up and throw away the key."

New Sword for Mikado Being Cast With Rites

Tokyo.—Forged with ceremonial solemnity, the new state sword of Emperor Hirohito is in the hands of the most famous craftsmen in Japan. When the new mikado goes to join his fathers the weapon will be lowered into the imperial sarcophagus with his body.

In having a sword specially cast for him, Hirohito has departed from the custom of his father, the late Emperor Yoshihito, and his grandfather, Emperor Meiji, who used only swords made many years ago by noted artisans.

Sadakatsu Tsukiyama of Osaka, the most noted modern swordmaker of Japan, started the forging with prayers and ceremony. Priests stewed incense and Tuskiyama, with two assistants all in white ceremonial garments, solemnly placed the iron ore in the furnace and a new scepter for a new mikado was begun.

After being treated to the expertness of Tsukiyama, the weapon will be turned over to Riko Hishida, the leading sword polisher, who will give it the finishing touches.

Inventor Risks Life in Test of Autogiro Plane

Southampton, England.—Frank B. Courtney, an experimental air pilot, deliberately risked his life to prove the principle of his windmill plane was right.

The experiment ended in a crash in which Courtney was slightly hurt. One wing of the plane had come off while 60 feet in the air and another came off when within 15 feet of the ground, letting the machine fall like a stone.

"I am still convinced," Courtney said, "that the principle of the autogiro is right. I shall go on with the experiments, though in a different way. I knew that the breakage was inevitable and I had put in a report previously to that effect. But as no one would believe me the only way to test my theories was to break the machine in the air."

Cost of Education

New Haven, Conn.—The cost to parents of the average Yale education is $7,200, a questionnaire shows. Student expenses average $1,800 a year.

Lighting of Airways Heavy Expense Item

Washington. — Establishment and operation of lighting systems to permit night flying is the chief item of expense in the maintenance of airways.

W. P. McCracken, Jr., assistant secretary of commerce in charge of the government's efforts to assist development of commercial aviation, has ascertained that the required number of lights can be installed at a cost of $337 a mile, and maintained at an annual expense of $197.30.

His figures are based on the cost of lighting parts of the 1,195-mile airway from Chicago to Dallas. Air mail contractors who are operating on the route are taking in about $800 a day and McCracken expects the business to double during the year.

"DON'T walk through it. Don't smell it. Don't touch it. Go hungry for days first."

She's right. Peterman's Roach Food exterminates every roach in your house. Nothing is left but a little dry dust.

Some housewives make the mistake of fighting cockroaches with a spray. Those are the houses roaches stay in. They live down behind baseboards, under the floors. No spray can possibly reach them, or their young, or their eggs.

Only a powder can exterminate them. Peterman's Roach Food is the right powder. Just one roach gets a little powder on his legs. Back to his nest he goes. He crawls over the others and eggs. Every roach he touches dies and disintegrates.

Here is the right insecticide for each insect:

PETERMAN'S ROACH FOOD exterminates cockroaches.
PETERMAN'S ANT FOOD exterminates ants.
FLYOSAN kills flies and mosquitoes.
PETERMAN'S DISCOVERY exterminates bedbugs.
PETERMAN'S MOTH FOOD protects against moths.

You must have a specific insecticide for each insect. No single insecticide will exterminate them all. We know that is true. We have had nearly 50 years' experience.

Peterman's has the right insecticide for each insect. On sale wherever drugs are sold.

IN MEMORY

We cannot but halt a moment, as we cross the threshold of the beautiful month of May, in silent honor of those who gave their all that we might prosper and live in a world of happiness and peace. "Their" day comes in May. A single day out of a year of length—yet more hearts, and minds, and love, will surrender on Decoration Day than on any other of the year.

The torn hearts of the mothers who lost their "boys" on the battlefields of Europe will rest easier as the Almighty casts His reflection over the world on Decoration Day. The graves of those "boys" will again feel the tears of the loved ones left behind.

No honor is too great for those who laid down their lives in the wars of our nation, since its birth. No flowers are beautiful enough to grace the graves of our "Soldiers."

It is our prayer, and the prayer of countless others in all parts of the warld, that Decoration Day, this year, will serve to tender the resting places of out great, and ease many heavy hearts.

A. Anfinson and R. J. Vieths motored to Winnipeg Saturday, returning Sunday evening.

Dr. Bowers of Thief Rives was here on Saturday.

O. C. Brenna of Middle River shipped a carload of stock from here to St. Paul on Saturday.

Left Fire for Parade

All good New Yorkers love a fire—but they love a parade better. This was demonstrated when police, called to hold in check a dense crowd gathered to view a small basement fire suddenly had their problem solved by a band and 120 brilliantly uniformed Cossacks, who crossed Fifth avenue a block away. The crowd, with a single impulse, deserted the firemen to follow the parade.

Ken Pulled Film Rescue--- But It Was the Real Thing

In "Somewhere In Sonora" a real rescue scene, in which Ken Maynard, cowboy star, figures, will satisfy any thrill-seeker.

The action required Kathleen Collins, the leading lady, and Yvonne Howell to be driving in a buckboard led by two horses, who were supposed to run away. The horses, frightened by the action, instead of doing a "make-believe" runaway, started on an actual one and went tearing down the canyon, alongside of which was a yawning chasm several thousand feet deep.

Ken immediately hopped on Tarzen, his horse, and tore after the runaway team. He made a rescue such as has never been seen on the screen, for the buckboard was beginning to lean over towards the chasm by time he caught up with it and grabbed the flying reins in his hands. He jumped from Tarzen to the nearest horse in a manner similar to stunts he has done before. The difference was that prior to this incident they had been but "stunts" and here the lives of both girls depended on his doing it successfully.

Good Paint Costs Less!

IT'S a fact—good paint actually costs you less to use than poor paint. A low price per gallon on poor paint is deceiving because it takes more gallons to cover a given surface and then you haven't got a job that will protect as well or last as long as good paint.

SCHOOL NOTES

There have been some rumors of the annual school picnic. Someone has suggested that we have it on Friday after 3:30 p.m. Perhaps that would be possible if the weather permits. Certainly we want the annual picnic, but When? is the question. Let's keep planning it just the same.

Yesterday (May 26) we had our last classes in the high school for this school year. The first examination given was in English I, at 8 p. m., and the last one will be given to the 8th grade Thursday June 2 at 8 p.m., in Spelling.

The Commencement Exercises will take place in the school auditorium on Thursday, June 2d at 8 p. m. We are anxious to have all of you who are interested in our school and the work we have done and expect to do in the future, to attend these graduation exercises. We extend to you a hearty welcome.

WOMEN CAN NOW DO MORE

Because Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Keeps Them Well

Fifty years ago there were few occupations for women. Some taught school, some did housework, some found work to do at home and a few took up nursing.

Today there are very few occupations not open to women. Today they work in factories with hundreds of other women and girls. There are also women architects, lawyers, dentists, executives, and legislators. But all too often a woman wins her economic independence at the cost of her health.

Mrs. Elizabeth Chamberlain who works in the Unionall factory making overalls writes that she got "wonderful results" from taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Mrs. Chamberlain lives at 500 Monmouth St., Trenton, N. J. She recommends the Vegetable Compound to her friends in the factory and will gladly answer any letters she gets from women asking about it.

If Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped other women, why shouldn't it help you?

The Leading Lady

STORY FROM THE START

While despondent over the enforced hiding of her fiance, Jim Dallas, slayer in self-defense of Homer Parkinson, Sybil Saunders, popular actress, is engaged to play Viola in a charity performance of "Twelfth Night" on Gull island, on the Maine coast. After the play Hugh Bassett, Anne Tracy's fiance, tells Joe he has heard he is spying on Sybil to learn the whereabouts of Jim Dallas and earn the reward offered by the Parkinson family. The boy denies it. To Anne he betrays his enmity toward Sybil. Stokes tells Sybil he has news of Dallas, and to secure privacy they arrange to meet in a small summer house. Flora Stokes tells Bassett she saw Sybil shot but did not see her murderer. Bassett notified the sheriff, Abel Williams. The latter suspects Flora Stokes. Anne Tracy discovers Joe hiding on the island, which he was supposed to have left, and warns him against attempting to escape.

With that knowledge her outlook changed. Her passive role was over. If Joe had done it and if he was on the island he would try to get off at low tide. It was safe to assume that he was outside, hidden till the causeway was open. To go out to find him would be useless, he would never reveal himself to her, and if she was seen suspicion would instantly be aroused. She must get somewhere that would command the causeway and its approaches. The best place—the only place—was the living room entrance. From there she could see in all directions, the balcony end, the kitchen wing, the pine grove. She would try to wave him back, possibly get to him—she had to take her chances and trust to Heaven.

The tide was at full ebb at midnight. At a quarter before she made ready. She took from the bureau a book she had been reading—if she met anyone she could say she had come down to find it—and opened her door with the stealth of a burglar. A dead silence reigned as she stole down the stairs and into the living room.

At the entrance, pressed against the door, she looked out. It was a world of white enchantment, breathlessly still. She could see the patterned surfaces of leaves, the cracks and fissures of the rocks. Below, the channel lay almost bare, pools glistening like dropped mirrors, mounds of mud casting inky shadows.

She could hear the murmur of the men's voices from the open library windows, and like the throbbing of a muffled engine, the beating of her own heart.

Into that deep enveloping quietude came a sound, so faint, so infinitely small and hushed, that only expectant ears could have caught it. It came from the room behind her, and turning, she slid back against the wall, her body black against its blackness. The sound continued, the opening of a door opposite, the door into the kitchen wing. It seemed no door in the world had ever opened so slowly—creaking, stopping, resuming, dying away. She could see nothing, for the darkness of the gallery lay impenetrable over that furtive entrance.

There was a footstep, light as the fall of a leaf, and she saw him coming toward her in that high luminous pallor from the windows. He was like a shadow, so evenly dark, a shape without detail, moving with a shadow's noiseless passage. She saw the outline of the cap on his head and that he carried his shoes in one hand.

She came forward with a hand raised for caution, sending her voice before her in an agonized whisper:

"Go back, Joe. The causeway's watched. You can't get over that way. Go!"

He was gone, a fleet flying, vanishing back into the darkness under the gallery. Out of it came the soft closing of the door.

The room swayed, pale light and darkness swam and coalesced. She knew she was near a table and put out her hand to steady herself by it, something solid to hold to for one minute. The polished surface slid under her fingers and she groped out with the hand that held the book. The book slipped from her clasp, fell with a thud like a thunderclap, and a grasping snatch to save it swept a lamp crashing to the floor. Panic dispelled her faintness and she made a rush for the door. She had gained it. Her fingers clutched round the knob, as she heard the steps of the men in the hall and knew it was too late to escape.

They burst in, thrust into the room's dim quiet as if shot by a blast.

"It's nothing," she called, hearing her voice thin and hoarse. "Nothing's happened. It's only Anne Tracy."

The lights leaped out and she saw them, Bassett with his hand on the electric button, stricken still, looking this way and that. His eye found her first, backed against the door, a small green-clad figure with an ashen face.

"What's this mean?" said Rawson.

"Nothing." She was afraid the hand would rattle with the shaking of her hand so let it go. "I upset the lamp in the dark. I didn't see it, that's all."

"What are you doing here?"

"I came down to get my book. I forgot and left it when I went upstairs."

She could get her breath now and her voice was under control. She felt strength oozing back into her body and with it courage.

"You're as white as a sheet," Williams blurted out.

"Did something frighten you?" demanded Bassett.

"No, but a sort of faintness came over me, there by the table, and I grabbed at it and upset the lamp."

Rawson looked at the table with the shattered fragments of the lamp beside it. It was not far from the entrance door.

"Did you see anything—anything outside?"

"No, not a thing and I didn't hear a sound."

"What do you suppose made you feel faint?"

"Oh!" She dared to make a gesture, upraised hands that dropped limply. "Hasn't there been enough here to make anybody faint?"

"You've got to remember, Rawson," said Bassett who thought the man's insistence unnecessary, "what a shock this has been—especially to Miss Tracy who was Miss Saunders' friend."

"I remember." Then to Anne: "Miss Tracy, if you should withhold any information from us you'd get yourself into a very uncomfortable position."

"I wouldn't, I wouldn't," she breathed.

Rawson's glance remained on her, dubiously intent. Bassett noted it with a resentment he found it difficult to hide.

"You can absolutely rely on Miss Tracy," he said. "She would be perfectly frank with you if she had anything to tell."

"No doubt, no doubt," said the other, and walked to the entrance. "I'm going out to have a look around." On the sill he turned and addressed Anne. "I gave some instructions to you ladies and I expected to have them followed. You'll please remember them in the future."

He passed out into the brilliancy of the moonlight. Now that he was gone Bassett felt he must make her understand. He had been astonished at what she had done. It was so unlike her, a disobedience of orders at such a time as this.

"You must do what they tell you, Anne. They have to make these rules and it's up to us to keep them."

"I will now, you can trust me. Mr. Williams, you can see how it was. I couldn't sleep and my mind was full of this awful thing, and I thought if I could put it on something else—get free from my thoughts even for a few moments!"

Williams grunted his comprehension. He felt rather tenderly toward her, she looked so small and wan and her voice was so pleading.

"Where was your book?" he asked.

"On the table behind you. I was feeling round for it and I think I pushed it off with the lamp."

"What was the name of it?"

"'Victory,'" by Joseph Conrad."

He went to the table. His back turned, she and Bassett exchanged a long look. Williams picked up the book and came back with it.

"Here it is," he said, giving it to her. "And just make a note of the fact that you're not to go round the house at night after books or anything else."

She assured him she would not, she would give them no more trouble, and opening the door she slipped away. They remained without speaking till she came out on the gallery and walked to her room.

"Well," said Williams, "her book was there."

Bassett stared at him:

"Was there! Why shouldn't it be? Good God! You have any idea she was lying? If you have, get it out of your head. I've known Miss Tracy for three years and she could no more say what wasn't true than—well, she couldn't, that's all."

"I don't think she did. It sounded to me a perfectly straight story."

"It was. You can take my word for that."

They were back in the library when Rawson reappeared with Shine. Shine, unable to sleep, had been sitting by his window when Rawson, scouting, had stopped to inquire if he had seen anyone. Shine had not, but had volunteered to join in a hunt and the two had been about the house and the immediate vicinity. Nothing had been discovered and Patrick had seen no sign of life or heard no sound. Now they had come back for the electric torch and were going to extend their search. A person concealed on the seaward side of the island might be moving at this hour when the causeway was free. Bassett said he would go with them and the three men left the room by one of the long windows.

Williams opened the library door and turned off the lights. The noise of the departing trio would suggest to anyone on the watch that the house was free of police supervision and there might be developments. He took the desk chair as easier to rise from than the deep-seated leather ones and settled himself to a resume of what they had so far gathered.

He was convinced of Mrs. Stokes' guilt and ran over the reasons. A hysterical woman, frantic with jealousy—that alone was enough. But that woman had been the only member of the party who at the time of the shooting had been some distance from the house. She had taken the pistol with the intention of using it if an occasion offered. The occasion had offered. Miss Saunders, unable to resist the beauty of the evening, had gone to the Point alone. He set no store by Rawson's opinion that the woman's state of mind was too genuinely distracted. He considered it as part of a premeditated plan carried through with nerve and skill. She would have known that the report of the pistol would have been heard at the house. This, when Miss Saunders did not return, would have suggested foul play. And she, Mrs. Stokes, was the only person out on the island. A later entrance, with an assumption of ignorance, would have turned suspicion on her like a pointing finger. She was too intelligent for that.

It was at this juncture that he suddenly cocked his head and let his hands drop softly to the arms of the chair. From the stairs outside came a faint creak, a pause and then again, step by step a bare or stockinged foot in gradual descent.

The big man arose as noiselessly as he could and made for the hall. But his bulk and his boots were not adapted to rapid movements or silent surprise. As he reached the hall he heard the pattering flight of light feet and cursed under his breath as he felt for the electric button. Her room—the one he had seen Miss Pinkney put her in—was just beyond the stairhead to the right. And her husband's—he turned and faced the secretive panels of its closed door.

Williams dropped his head and trod thoughtfully back to the library, but this time he left the hall lights on. Also he lit the library ones and allowed himself the solace of a cigar. "She won't try that again tonight," he said to himself and dropped into an easy chair.

Then Stokes must know. They had had opportunity for private conference in that hour after the murder when the others were out of the house. She had either told him or he had accused her; for all they knew he might have seen her do it. Anyway she wanted to get speech with him and it might be support, counsel, the matching up of their stories—but whatever it was she must have been in dire straights to take such a risk.

Williams smoked on, comfortably sprawled in the deep chair, thinking out a line of attack on the Stokeses.

Records of History in Ancient Mirrors

In the days when a mirror was a piece of burnished, unframed metal it was, in many countries a work of art. The chemistry of years have rendered these ancient mirrors no longer fit for the purpose for which they were made, but antiquarians still consult them for a glimpse into the past. Etruscan mirrors, for example, covered with pictures of gods and heroes, have been called the "figurative dictionary of Etruscan mythology," and this would apply to the Greek mirrors as well. Chinese mirrors also are in accord with the ideas of Oriental philosophy, and the Egyptian, while less ornate than the others, are deeply indicative of racial thought. With the Egyptions the very form of the mirror had a significance. It was generally in the shape of the solar disk, indicating the connection between the mirror and the sun god. In China, mirrors were placed in great numbers in graves. In Japan, the mirror was one of the three objects of the imperial insignia, the other two being the sword and the jewel. The oldest mirrors that exist today are the Egyptian.—International Studio.

6 things to understand about used car allowances

1 When you trade-in your used car for a new car, you are after all making a purchase, not a sale. You are simply applying your present car as a credit toward the purchase price of the new car.

2 Your used car has only one fundamental basis of value; i. e., what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.

3 Your used car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.

4 The largest allowance is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; sometimes it is not.

5 An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.

6 First judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your used car.

Roosevelt Knew Secret

One of the secrets of Theodore Roosevelt's active life and strenuous disposition was his ability to thoroughly relax for 15 minutes at a time during the course of a hard day's work. He had the facility of ceasing to work, throwing himself back in a chair and relaxing. This relaxation, according to physicians, was as good as an hour's sleep. Few men could detach themselves from worry and strain for short periods as did Roosevelt.

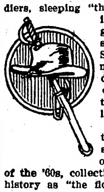
Honors Paid to Wearers of Gray

Graves of Southern Prisoners Remembered.



Two hundred and six Southern soldiers, sleeping "the last long sleep" in a little burying ground on Johnson's island in Sandusky bay, four miles north of Sandusky, Ohio, again claim the recognition that is annually theirs.

The graves of these two hundred six, mostly officers of the Confederacy of the '60s, collectively referred to in history as "the flower of the Southern army," have come to be Sandusky's own. They are never forgotten.

When the first Memorial day was observed the thoughts of the "boys" of the locality who had worn the blue, turned to their brothers of "the enemy," the boys who had worn the gray.

"They're far from friends and home, comrades," said the late Gen. Isaac Foster Mack, of Sandusky, orator of the occasion. "Let us remember them as the valiant soldiers that they were, the soldiers who gave their all for the cause they espoused, and honor them accordingly."

Flowers were plucked in the dooryards of the dwellings of those boys in blue, flowers which later rested on the graves in the Johnson's Island cemetery, of boys who had worn the gray

Flowers on "Gray."

And so a custom was established that endures today—a custom in the continuation of which sons and daughters of those men who established it are always active in the morning of Memorial day.

Bright and early on the morning of Memorial day a boat puts out from Sandusky with Johnson's island as the destination of the dozen or so aboard. Within the island burying ground a prayer is said and a hymn sung. Then flowers are strewn upon the graves.

Who are those southern sons who sleep in the little burying ground on Johnson's island? Available records fail to disclose the names of all. They do, however, show that each man—and the men were officers with but few exceptions—was brought to the lonely island as a prisoner of war between the autumn of 1862 and the early spring of 1865.

Grave No. 1 contains the mortal remains of Coy. J. E. Crugg or Scruggs, who commanded the Eighty-fifth Virginia troops, and who died March 5, 1863.

In grave No. 2 rests Capt. E. J. Tuggles, Company H, Thirty-fifth regiment Georgia infantry, who died March 6, 1863.

The records do not show who sleep in graves 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, their headstone bearing the single word: "Unknown."

On down the list of known soldiers buried in the cemetery one notes names of which not only the Southland but the nation today is justly proud.

Monument Marks Graves.

Through the efforts of the membership of Martha Patton chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy of Cincinnati, needed money was raised by subscription and, in 1905, the cemetery plot was purchased by the chapter, thus insuring its retention to posterity. The price paid was $1,200.

June 8, 1910, a monument erected at the entrance to the burying ground—the first monument ever erected to the memory of Southern soldiers in the so-called "North"—was dedicated. The United Daughters of the Confederacy supplied the necessary money, which was also raised by subscription.

The unveiling of the monument was made the occasion of elaborate ceremonies. The late Gen. George W. Gordon, the last major general of the Confederate army and, at the time, commander-in-chief of the United Confederate Veterans, delivered the dedicatory address. Prominent men and women of the "South" and the "North" met and fraternized.

The monument, unveiled by Mrs. Mary Patton Hudson of Cincinnati, daughter of Col. Robert W. Patton, a West Virginia ranger after whom Robert Patton chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, was named, was designed and executed by Sir Moses Ezekiel, a soldier under Lee and was donated to the United Daughters of the Confederacy by him. The cost, had not the sculptor given, would have been approximately $8,000.

Louisiana Tiger.

The statue at the entrance to the Johnson's Island cemetery represents a "Louisiana tiger," with one hand clutching a musket and the other raised above the eyes, giving the figure as a whole the appearance of peering into the distance. It has been so set that it faces the south.

The monument is 21 feet in height. The base beneath the plinth was contributed by the state of Mississippi, through its Grand Lodge of Masons and bears the inscription:

"The stone upon which this is inscribed was placed by the Grand Lodge of Mississippi in remembrance of the Masons who sleep here."

The foundation of the monument is of Winnsboro (S. C.) marble.

Foraker's Good Work.

That the Johnson's Island cemetery is to endure is due to the activities of the late United States Senator Joseph Benson Foraker of Ohio, almost as much as to the endeavors of the women of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. Senator Foraker personally negotiated the procedure that vested Robert Patton chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, with title to this little plot of hallowed ground, and, later, saw to it that markers for the graves were provided by the federal government.

Black, Fall Favorite

Black is easily first among colors which make their appearance in the styles of the autumn and winter, on the basis of the fashion displays in Paris. "I tried about everything in that time and finally in 1923 decided to give Tanlac a trial. The first few bottles helped me so well that I kept on taking Tanlac and improved right along. OUR PANAMA CANAL LEADING BRITISH DITCH AT SUEZ IN TRAFFIC TONNAGE

U.S. TRANSPORT "NORTHERN PACIFIC" PASSING THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL

GATUN LOCKS

U.S.S. PENNSYLVANIA AT CHAGRES RIVER CROSSING

Increase of Freight via Panama Route, Largely Due to Oil Shipments, Indicates Rise of United States to Leadership of World's Commerce.

By JUDSON C. WELLIVER

One of the striking evidences of America's rapid rise toward commercial and industrial leadership of the world, is the Panama Canal, will almost certainly handle more freight in 1926 than will Suez. For several years the two canals have been in a neck and neck competition whose implications are the more interesting because the Panama ditch is owned by the American Government, and that at Suez by the British Government.

Of course both Canals are open to the ships of all nations; and the competition between them is not only between the United States and Britain, but in a larger and even more significant view it is competition between old world and new world.

When the Panama Canal was opened in 1915, Suez was already transiting about 25,000,000 tons of freight annually. Almost nobody believed Panama could ever attract anything approaching such a volume. But during the war fear of German submarines in the Mediterranean caused many vessels to take the Panama route between the far east and European or American ports. This gave Panama its introduction and it has not only held but greatly increased its business since the war. In 1923 Panama transited 5037 vessels, against 4621 for Suez; Panama handled 25,180,000 cargo tons against 22,770,000 for Suez. This was the first year of Panama's lead.

A Close Race

The following year Suez barely exceeded Panama's tonnage; and in 1925 comfortably held its lead. But reports for 1926 to date indicate that Suez is losing, owing to Britain's industrial depression, while Panama is doing better and is pretty certain to resume the lead.

The present Suez Canal has been in operation nearly sixty years, Panama only eleven. Although few people except antiquarians know it, the first canal at Suez was built more than 3,000 years ago. It was in operation as early as B. C. 1380; how long before, is mere conjecture. Before the Christian era began the ditch had been built, destroyed, rebuilt, silted up and built up again, time after time. When Alexander the Great conquered Egypt the Canal was one of the oldest of engineering works.

Between 1904 and 1915 the present Panama Canal was constructed. It cost about $400,000,000, Suez about one-fourth that sum. But Suez is a simple, sea-level ditch across a sandy plain; while Panama is a lock canal, the greater part of its length lying 85 feet above sea level, so that most of the distance from ocean to ocean is through an artificial freshwater lake.

Early Profits Unexpected

When Roosevelt started building at Panama, neither he nor any other prophet of optimism would have dared suggest that within its first decade the Canal would earn a profit. Its chief justification concerned the national defense, and the establishment of competition with the transcontinental railroads.

Although both Canals are open to shipping of all nations, British vessels constitute the majority of those using Suez (55.8 per cent), while American vessels are 54.5 per cent of those using Panama.

For 1924, ships of 21 nations used the Suez route, while 24 nations were represented in the maritime caravan at Panama.

The World War was not the only unexpected factor in bringing Panama so quickly to equality with Suez, nor the most important. The enormous increase in Panama traffic in 1923 was represented almost entirely by petroleum and its products, moving from California to the east coast and Europe. In the year ended June 30, 1924, tolls aggregating $24,290,000 were collected, of which $9,071,000 was from tankers carrying petroleum. An even more striking statement of the matter is that for the same year exactly 50 per cent of all tonnage through the Canal was between the two ocean fronts of the United States; that is, 13,500,000 tons; and of this, considerably over 9,000,000 tons, or more than two-thirds was petroleum. It was of course chiefly from California, en route to eastern refineries. In the succeeding year this petroleum movement fell off heavily; but for 1926 it is again increasing and the increase is likely to continue for many years. But for the petroleum traffic, the Canal would have shown a deficit in every year of its operation.

The enormous petroleum business has been in other ways advantageous to Panama. A constantly increasing proportion of maritime shipping nowadays uses oil fuel. Oil-burning ships seek routes on which they can most cheaply buy oil; and because California oil can be put so cheaply into the bunkers of vessels passing through the Panama ditch, there is a substantial inducement to prefer this route. This will increasingly favor Panama and militate against Suez, as the number of oil burners increases. Moreover, Panama's advantage will still further increase as the enormous oil resources of Venezuela, Colombia, and other South American countries are developed.

Great Service of Panama

If cheap petroleum has thus served Panama so well, Panama in turn has equally served the American motorist, who consumes most of the world's petroleum products. For Panama has brought the Pacific Coast petroleum to the eastern market at costs which, but for the Canal, would be vastly greater. Thus the Canal has given the United States the cheapest petroleum products in the world, and helped build the automobile industry and our modern highway system.

This mutually helpful relationship between the Canal and the petroleum users is the more impressive when one realizes that it was not even remotely anticipated at the time President Roosevelt started building the Canal. So late, indeed, as 1910, when Admiral Evans wrote his articles about the Canal and decided that it could not be profitable for several decades at least, he based all his calculations on the probable cost of coal for bunkering ships. He did not dream that merchant marines were on the verge of the revolutionary change from coal to oil. So he figured that, as there is practically no bunker coal in the countries bordering on the Pacific, that ocean could not compete, by way of Panama, for a greatly increased share of shipping. The oil development overturned the prophecies of Admiral Evans, and of all others who had foreseen that fuel problems would make Panama unprofitable.

Arno Steinhauer after holding second place for four months he exchanged place with J. P. Augustine who has been first during those same months. Anton Rodahl being fourth for last month made another step-up and holds third place for April. Mr. Benitt takes fourth and is closely followed for fifth place by S. Nohre who has been one of our big patrons for sometime but this is the first time his name appeared among the first five on the list. Here is luck to Mr. Nohre and my wish is that some day your name will head the honor list.

When ever a new name appears at the top of the list it means more progress and that more and more of our patrons are getting more out of their cows, usually getting more profit from the cows.

This backward spring and excessive rain is anything but encouraging and no doubt will have its effect on the milk flow, which in return will reduce the cream check considerable. It appears at this writing that under the best of weather conditions the only grain that can be sown with any hopes of maturing is of the variety that can be used for feed and forage I believe that would be advisable to sow oats even tho the season should be so short that it wouldn't mature it can be cut green and used to advantage for hay.

I have heard many say so far we have but little to kick about as far as the weather and floods are concerned. I am certain that each and every one of us would be glad to stay right here if we only knew conditions and suffering the people in our southern states have gone thru these last few weeks. Imagine living where the flood was so bad that whole towns have been absolutely wiped out, yes, as many as twelve towns in twenty-four hours completely flooded away. People have died by the hundreds yet many have been rescued. Some saved their lives by climbing up trees, in spite of the fact that snakes had done likewise and there are instances where bites from these snakes have caused death in a few minutes.

We cannot no more realize and imagine the the suffering the big Mississippi flood has caused humanity than you can what the soldiers suffered in the great World War that helped hold the western front. The only way could know would be to participate. I happen to be one of the many boys that went across to help make this country safe for democracy, but found upon our return that the Republicans had everything well in hand.

In closing let us not forget to make the best of what we have. By that I mean efficiency. It pays to sell cream yet it pays to sell cream of a better quality. There is no question but many of our former products and income will be less on account of the excess moisture, yet 2 cents and 5 cents more per pound for butterfat will help considerably in making up the shortage. Let us try to deliver a Land O' Lakes product, moreso now than ever before.

Such a product is easier to deliver by getting in early in the forenoon in the summer months besides it gives us a better chance to keep it such if cream is all in by noon and we can start to pasteurize right after dinner.

Yours for co-operation:
Submitted by P. L. Anderson.

Dix and "Gunboat" Smith At It Again in New Film

Anyone who has seen the husky Richard Dix in action knows that he packs a wallop. In each of his pictures, he has had to battle in he-man style with the villain, but usually was the victor.

And now he has taken his first licking. In "The Lucky Devil," coming here next Thursday, June 9, Dix wins $200 at a county fair by standing up against a bruiser, impersonated by "Gunboat" Smith, for two rounds without being knocked cuckoo, but the beating he gets is enough and plenty, as Dix is willing to take whatever the other fellow can give him.

InterstatePowerCoAdopts Customer Ownership Plan

Chance for Small Inventors to Put Their Savings Into Dividend-Paying Stock of Local Company. Tax Free Feature.

An announcement of unusual interest to local people is made today by the Interstate Power Company. This announcement states that every one may become interested in this business by investing their savings, either in small or large amounts, in shares of the Company's $7 Dividend Preferred Stock, which pays dividends every three months amounting to $7 a share each year, bringing an income of more than 7 per cent of the money invested.

Knowing that a large number would like to take advantage of such an exceptional investment opportunity, the Company is offering the stock for cash and on a most liberal partial payment plan. Payments as low as $7.50 a month will be accepted.

This places the security within the reach of all.

"Customer Ownership," said an official of the Interstate Power Company yesterday, "is growing rapidly all over the United States. One customer in every twenty is now an owner of electric power and light securities. Over two hundred electric power and light companies are engaged in the sale of securities to their customers. This is practical, business-like, and in the public interest.

"Believing that all public service companies should encourage such public ownership, Interstate Power Company is selling an additional issue of Cumulative Preferred Stock to its customers, employes and other local people. This stock pays dividends every three months and we believe local people are the logical ones to receive the money the Company will pay out every three months, thus sharing in its success.

"This will be of mutual advantage. Customers and others who invest will gain by receiving dividends which amount to over 7% on the dollar, while the Company will gain from them a more cordial interest in its affairs and a better understanding of what a well-managed electric power and light company means to the every-day life of all of us.

"This stock is not something for rich people only. Folks who have only a hundred dollars can invest in our stock on exactly the same basis and enjoy the same rights and privileges as the person with thousands of dollars to invest. Anyone who would like to invest his savings will find this stock the answer to the question, "where can I put my savings so that they will be SAFE and still earn as much as 7% for me?"

"What I consider one of the finest things about our stock is that it is CUMULATIVE. This means that all money due as dividends to Preferred Stockholders must be paid before the owners of the common stock can receive a cent.

"The income from the investment is free from the present normal Federal Income Tax.

"A very important feature of our Customer Ownership Plan is that the Company will maintain a resale department at its offices for the benefit of local stockholders who may wish to sell their shares. When folks buy stock or other securities they too frequently neglect to make sure that if they want to realize on their holdings they can do so easily and promptly.

"This stock can be purchased at any office or through any employee of the Company."

The Annual Storm Battle

Late Spring and early Summer is the season of severe lightning and rain storms. This is the hardest season of the year for the Power & Light Company to maintain their service.

Driving on slippery mud roads; climbing poles and making repairs in the inky blackness of a rainy night; risking life and limb that you may have as few and as short interruptions as possible in your electric service.

Dakota Dairyman Tells Facts

For many years J. H. Putnam sought relief in vain. Completely broken in health and spirit, he tried Tanlac. Now a model of vigor and strength.

The Holstein Dairy of J. H. Putnam on Route No. 2, Aberdeen, So. Dakota, is widely and favorably known. For several years Mr. Putnam's health was so broken it was feared he could not continue to operate his dairy.

"I suffered a complete physical and nervous breakdown," he said recently. "I had neither strength nor vitality, but felt weak and exhausted all the time. Nerves tangled, head aching constantly, my life was a continuous misery. There seemed to be no hope; nothing I tried relieved me.

"Only when I gave Tanlac a trial did I notice any improvement. My appetite increased and my digestion was much better. For the first time in several years I began to feel strong and free from pain and nausea. I kept on taking Tanlac, growing sturdier all the time and very soon was a new man entirely. Since then I've enjoyed the finest health and go through the heaviest day's work without exhaustion. Tanlac deserves all the praise I can give it."

If you're feeling "off color" for any reason, try Tanlac. It is nature's own remedy, made of herbs, roots and barks. Your druggist has it. Over 52,000,000 bottles sold.

CHAPTER VIII

—11—

The night search of the island had given up nothing and a daylight exploration was set for the morning. Before this, however, Rawson wanted to go through Miss Saunders' room, which by his orders had been locked and left untouched.

Steeped in the morning sun, warm and still, it extended its welcome as if waiting for her entrance. The signs of feminine occupation caught the eyes of the men and held them chilled on the threshold. A delicate perfume filled the air, the fragrance of her passing habitation still lingering in ghostlike sweetness after the living presence had gone.

Rawson moved first, shaking off the spell. He looked into the open wardrobe trunk, completely packed but for the last hanger. "Going to put her costume there," he said, touching it with his index finger. He pulled out the drawers and ran his eye over their contents. A gray crepe dress lay across the foot of the bed, beside it a cloak and a black hat with a water-lily garnishing the brim. "These," he said, "were the clothes left out to wear."

Bassett nodded. He could see Sybil in the gray dress with her hair a golden fluff below the edge of the black hat. She had worn them on the way up and been pleased when he had admired her costume.

The dressing table was the only place in the room that her neat arranging hand had not touched. It was covered with a litter of toilet articles, cold cream jars, rouge boxes, powders and scents, a silver hand mirror, a pair of long white gloves. Williams picked up a bead bag and opened it. It contained a wisp of handkerchief, a bunch of keys, a lipstick and a gold change purse. In the central compartment were three five-dollar bills and in the gold purse one dollar and thirty-five cents in coins.

"This couldn't have been all the money she had," he queried.

"Why not?" said Bassett. "I guess some of us haven't that much. She didn't need any. All our expenses were paid and she was going straight home. One of those bills was probably intended for Miss Pinkney."

Nothing more came to light. The closets were empty, the bathroom contained a few toilet articles and a nightgown and negligee hanging on the door. Obviously a place swept clean for a coming departure by one who had no premonition that that departure would be final.

They passed out and along the hall, Rawson wanting to see the disposition of the passages and stairs. At the door next to Miss Saunders' he stopped, asking who occupied that room. It was vacant now but had been Joe Tracy's. He opened the door and looked in upon another chintz-hung chamber, all signs of recent habitation removed that morning by Miss Pinkney's energetic hand. A steamer trunk in the corner caught his attention and Bassett explained it was young Tracy's trunk, which his sister was to take back to New York with her.

Beyond that the hall ran into the gallery passing under an arch of carved wood. They traversed it, looking down into the richly colored expanse of the room below, and fared on under a companion arch into the last stretch of the hall. At the stairhead Rawson halted:

"Only two flights connecting with this floor, the one in the front by the library and this. Now the top story—how do you get to that?"

Bassett showed them a staircase at the end of the hall. He had never been up there himself, but someone, Mrs. Cornell, he thought, had. It was the servants' quarters and had not been occupied during their stay, Miss Pinkney and her helper having had rooms on the gallery.

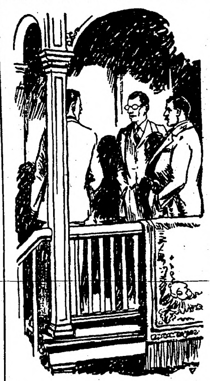
Later on they would take a look up there, the island was their business now. According to Williams, all this searching was merely a formality, and they descended the stairs conferring together. It was their purpose to keep Stokes and his wife from any possibility of private communication. Shine had been delegated to stay beside one or the other of them, and so far, they had made no attempts to get together. Their amenability added to Williams' suspicion and it was his suggestion that they should bring Stokes with them on their hunt. When that was finished they planned taking Mrs. Stokes to the place of the murder and making her rehearse just what she had seen.

Starting from the Point they explored the island foot by foot, scouting across the open expanses where a rabbit could hardly have hidden and prying into the hollows and rifts of the boulders on the shore. The path that followed the bluff's edge, making a detour round the ravines, yielded neither trace nor sign. The little amphitheater, sunk in its green cup, lay open to their eyes as they stood on its brink. They walked among the stone seats, seamed with a velvet padding of moss, and gathered up a few programs, a pair of woman's gloves and a necklace of blue beads.

That brought them to the end. The house had no outbuildings; garages, barns and sheds were in the village across the channel. There was no one in hiding on the island.

They found Flora, Shine and Mrs. Cornell on the balcony. As they came up Flora looked at them and then averted her glance as if in proud determination to show no curiosity. Rouge had been applied to her cheeks and her dry lips were a vivid rose color. The high tints showed ghastly on her withered skin but her dark eyes were scintillant with an avid burning vitality. It was like a face still holding the colors and hot warmth of youth suddenly stricken by untimely age.

Williams, halting at the foot of the steps, told her what they wanted—her position and Miss Saunders' at the time of the shooting, going over the ground and making it clear to them. She rose alertly with a quick understanding nod—she would be glad to, it was her earnest desire to be of help to them in any way she could. Rawson noticed that she did not look at her husband but kept her eyes on Williams with an intent frowning concentration, moving her head in agreement with his instructions.



Bassett Showed Them a Staircase at the End of the Hall.

At the shore she was eager to explain everything, took her place on the path where she had been when she saw Sybil appear on the other side of the hollow. Her rendering of the scene was graphic and given with much careful detail. The men, grouped about, followed her indicating hand, stopping her now and then with a question. Stokes stood back watching, his face in the searching daylight smoothly yellow like a face of wax.

Williams' questions were many and pointed, and it soon became evident to Bassett what he had in his mind—that her explanation of her actions did not account for the length of time she had been on the shore. Whether she saw it or not he could not tell; checked in her story she would answer patiently, reiterating her first statement that her stunned condition had robbed her of the power of thought or motion. But he was sure Stokes had grasped the trend of the query; he drew nearer, his flexible lips working, the hand hanging at his side clenching and unclenching. Once he assayed to speak, a hoarse sound throttled in escape. It pierced the strained attention she was giving her questioners, and, for the first time, she hesitated and fumbled for her words.

When it was over and they returned to the house, Stokes dropped to her side and drew her hand through his arm. She drooped against him; her narrow body looked nerveless, as if but for his support it would have crumpled and sunk. But he planted his feet with a hard defiance, each step drew a ringing echo from the rocks and he held his head high. Bassett, following them, noted his rigid carriage, and when he turned his profile, the wide nostril spread like that of a winded horse.

When lunch was over Williams and Rawson took up the trail again. They were now going to direct their attention to the Point, especially the summer house, from which a path led to the summit of the bluff whence Sybil had fallen. Bassett, who had hoped to get a word with Anne, was bidden to join them, and the three left the house step by step tracing the passage of the dead girl.

They began with the pine grove. Needles carpeted the ground, slippery smooth, a beaten trail winding between the tree trunks. Beyond it the path ascended the bare slope to the summer house, a small, six-sided building, covered by a thick growth of Virginia creeper that swathed its rustic shape. In four of its walls the vines, matted into a mantle of green, had been cut away to form windows. The other two sides held the entrances, one giving on the path that descended to the pine grove, one to its continuation to the Point. A circular seat ran round the walls and a table in the same bark-covered wood was the only movable piece of furniture. This was drawn up against the seat at one side. Rawson moved it out as the other two ran exploring eyes over the walls, the door-sills and the floor of wooden planking upon which a few leaves were scattered.

"Here," he cried suddenly. "What's this?" and drew from a crevice where the legs crossed, some scraps of a coarse gold material.

He held them up against the light of the opening—three short strands of what might have been the gilt string used to tie Christmas packages.

"What do you know about this?" he said, offering them to Bassett's gaze.

Bassett looked, and Williams with craned neck and lifted brows looked too. They were exactly of a length, broken filaments of thread attached to the end of each.

"They've been torn off something," Rawson indicated the threads, "caught in that joint of the table legs and pulled off. Did she have anything like this on her dress anywhere, a trimming or—"

"Fringe," Bassett interrupted, "the fringe on her sash."

"Ah!" Rawson could not hide his exultation. "Now we've got something we can get our teeth into."

"Yes." Bassett took the pieces and studied them in the light. "That's what it is. She wore a wide sash round her waist with ends that hung down edged with gold fringe. This is a bit of it."

"Well," said Williams, "that's a starter anyhow. She was in here."

Rawson sat on the bench and drew the table into its former position:

"It not only proves she was in here, but it proves a good deal more. This is the way she was, with the table as we found it close in front of her. The ends of her sash would have been in contact with the table legs. Now she jumped up quickly—do you get that? If she'd gone slow or had time to think she'd have felt the pull and unloosed the sash—but she sprang up, didn't notice." He looked from one to the other, his lean face alight.

"Frightened," said Bassett.

"So frightened she didn't feel it, and moved with such force she tore the fringe off. That scare took her up from the seat and sent her flying through the doorway for the Point."

"Hold on, now," said Williams. "If she was as scared as that, why didn't she go for the house, where there were people?"

"Because she was too scared to think. Some one with a pistol was on the other side of the table." He rose and went to the entrance facing the Point. "And the person with the pistol shot at her from here—winged her as she ran." He turned to Bassett. "That's why you saw no one when you looked out after you first heard the shot. The murderer was in here lying low."

"Yes." Bassett thought back over the moment when he had stood in the living-room doorway. "That's the only place he could have been or I'd have seen him. But they wouldn't have been any time together—couldn't have had a quarrel or a scene. According to Mrs. Cornell it was only six or seven minutes after she saw Sybil go out that she heard the shot. That would give them only two or three minutes in here."

Might Have Changed History of America

The first congress of the American colonies was convened in New York city about one hundred sixty-one years ago. The purpose of the convention was to consider the stamp act, Greville's obnoxious scheme of taxation. Tim Ruggles of Massachusetts was chairman of the congress, where delegates from nine states met.

In its two weeks' session the congress adopted a "Declaration of Rights," written by John Cruger; a "Petition to the King," by Bob Livingston, and a "Memorial to Both Houses of Parliament," from the pen of James Otis.

Had the powers that misruled England at this time paid more attention to the words of these earnest men history might have taken a different turn, but the figurehead on the English throne and the self-inflated ministers and coxcombs, who served him, were deaf to the distant thunder of discontent—and "lost a world."—Chicago Journal.

Two Witty Remarks

There is that glorious epicurean paradox uttered by my friend the historian, in one of his flashing moments: "Give us the luxuries of life and we dispense with its necessaries." To this must certainly be added that other saying of one of the wittiest of men: "Good Americans when they die go to Paris."—Holmes

Wife Raids Cigar Box; Chastisement Upheld

Atlantic City, N. J.—A husband has full control over his cigars and his wife may not molest them, it was decided here by Magistrate Andrew Jacoby. Charged with assault and battery, Duco Johnson was haled into court by his wife. She testified that during a party at their home she distributed cigars from a box her husband had "selfishly hidden," and that he then struck her. Other testimony indicated that this began a general melee, in which husband, wife and guests took part.

Magistrate Jacoby dismissed the charge because Johnson was "as badly battered as his wife" and because "a man's cigars are his inviolable property, to do with as he wishes."

BOY SWIMS FLOOD TO SAVE MARINES

Brings Warning of Damaged Bridge in Time.

St. Louis.—Garland Bowman, seventeen-year-old high-school student, swam a swollen creek and likely saved a Missouri-Kansas-Texas train, carrying several hundred marines en route to San Diego, Cal., from accident, it is announced at the company's offices.

The youth, at about 5:45 a. m., discovered a portion of the track had been washed away between Walnut and Fort Scott, Kan. He swam the swollen creek which had done the damage and ran to inform a station agent near Walnut. The train carrying the troops had just left Hepler, the last stop before Walnut. The railroad man and Bowman raced up the track. But they saw the headlight of the approaching train and realized they could not gain the other side of the creek before the train did. They lighted their flares and waved them; the locomotive slowed down and stopped just before it reached the washout.

Earlier in the morning the engineer and fireman of a southbound M.-K.-T. train were drowned and 18 persons were injured a short distance away, but on a different route from where the marine train danger was averted. The accident was caused by the overflow of Flat creek. Some time later a northbound train, rerouted because of the wreck, was wrecked a short distance south, and on the same line from where the marine train was halted. Flat creek also caused the trouble at this place. There were no serious injuries.

Knitting Woman Juror Makes Britons Gasp

London.—May women knit while serving as jurors in court?

One woman has already done it in Justice Avory's court, to the consternation of antifeminists, and there does not seem to be any way to stop the practice. The middle-aged woman who established a precedent took off her hat in a businesslike manner when she entered the jury box, produced her knitting and went to work.

She listened attentively to the proceedings, looking up from time to time when something interested her especially. It was clear that she was following the proceedings carefully, so there was no opening to charge her with inattention.

On another occasion a woman juror passed chocolates to other women who were serving on the jury. This was done discreetly and no judicial notice was taken of the act.

Women witnesses who were waiting to testify have frequently knitted in British courts, especially in war times, and no attempt has ever been made to stop this practice.

Mothers "Check" Babies in London Theaters

London.—Parking facilities with with attendants for babies and perambulators have been arranged for at a new cinema in Edmonton, a London borough.

Mothers who check their youngsters may be summoned from the theater, in event of an emergency, within a minute or so by the number of their baby check being flashed on the screen during the film performance.

Sidney L. Bernstein, proprietor of the new Edmonton movie house, says the scheme has worked so successfully that the idea is to be adopted in the string of ten cinemas which he controls.

Faithful Mongrel Finds His Way, 45 Miles, Home

Milwaukee.—Mickey is only a four-year-old mongrel dog, but under his yellow coat beats a heart whose life is loyalty to his master, William Rose Jr., eight. Two weeks ago Mr. and Mrs. Rose and William went to Watertown, Wis., taking Mickey with them. Leaving him there with friends, they returned to their home here and thought they were rid of the mongrel. But Mickey is back home. The dog found his way, somehow, over the distance of 45 miles, which he never before had traversed.

THIS NURSE NOW HAS GOOD HEALTH

Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for some time and I would not be without it in the house. As I am a children's nurse, I have to be on my feet a great deal and your medicine has helped me wonderfully. I was hardly able to do my housework when I began taking it, and now I am a strong and well woman, able to do all that and go out nursing besides. I have also used the Sanative Wash and found it beneficial."—MRS. GERTRUDE L. STEWART, 103 Davis St., Greenfield, Mass.

Valuable for Weakness

"I have found Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a valuable medicine for weakness."—MRS. J. A. PIETSCH, Box 397, Lancaster, Pa.

Hundreds of letters like these are received by the Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Mass. Grateful women from Pennsylvania to Washington, from Texas to Illinois and from Rhode Island to Nebraska say that their health has improved since taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Cold-Water Tinting
(Copyright 1927)

There are lots of "prepared tints" for home tinting of your dainty lingerie, but did you ever try real dye-tinting with a real dye? You get glorious effects when you begin with the true tones that only real dyes can impart to fabrics!

An envelope of the actual dye powder is only fifteen cents at any drug store. Sift a bit in cold water—dip the garment—and it's done. Only, you'll have a smooth, even tone just exactly like materials have when bought; none of that streaky look; never weak or "washy," no matter how much you dilute or lighten the color. Furthermore, you can "set" the tint if you want, by merely having the water boil.

Every drug store has Diamond dyes, color cards and suggestions for exquisite tinting or regular, permanent dyeing of anything. Or, write for Color Craft—a marvelous book of ideas in full colors; free from DIAMOND DYES, Dept. N33, Burlington, Vermont.

Feel Stiff and Achy?

TO feel constantly lame and achy is too often a sign of sluggish kidneys.

Sluggish action permits waste poisons to remain in the blood and is apt to make one languid, tired and achy, with dull headaches, dizziness and often a nagging backache. A common warning that the kidneys are not acting right is scanty or burning secretions.

Assist the kidneys at such times with Doan's Pills. Since 1885 Doan's have been winning friends the country over. Ask your neighbor!

50,000 Users Endorse Doan's:

George Facemire, 22 Orange St., Bridgeton, N. J., says: "My kidneys were not acting right and the secretions were scant and painful. Every morning I felt tired and languid and my back was so lame I had to have assistance in dressing. I started using Doan's Pills and in a short time was in splendid health. I gladly recommend Doan's."

FACTS about used car allowances

Most new car sales now involve the trading-in of a buyer's used car. More and more people are asking: "Why should my used car seem to have several values? .... Why should dealers in different makes of cars offer me allowances differing materially? .... Does the largest allowance offered mean the best deal for me?"

Here are basic facts:

1 Your used car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.

2 Your used car has only one fundamental basis of value: what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.

3 The largest trade-in allowance which is offered on your used car is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; but sometimes it is not.

4 An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.

5 Judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your used car.

WHEN YOU are ready to trade-in your present car, remember that after all you are making a purchase and not a sale. You are buying a new car and simply applying your present car as a credit toward the purchase price of a new car.

A Hint For You

White Cloud, Kans. — "I took Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription during the critical period of life when doctors did me no good. I got five bottles of the 'Prescription' and I feel it saved my life. I also took three bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for stomach trouble and nervousness, together with the 'Pleasant Pellets,' and was permanently relieved. I don't think Dr. Pierce's medicines can be beat for I know they saved my life. I feel that if others would take them they would be saved lots of money."

NEW WING PLANNED FOR U. S. CAPITOL

Building, Begun in 1783, to Have Extension.

Washington.—The capitol, as it stands today, is a symbol of the nation's growth. It has passed through three major stages of expansion, and is yet to be completed through extension of the central part of the east front to give it better architectural balance with the present senate and house sections.

This vast white monument, covering 153,113 square feet, embraces the first capitol of the United States, a modest, almost plain structure about 120 feet long and 100 feet wide, once large enough to accommodate the senate, the house, the Supreme court and the Library of Congress, but now too small for the court and its library.

Funds were scarce when the young government set out in 1793 to build its capitol after a design by Dr. William Thornton, calling for a domed rotunda, a portico and two wings, so it was decided to erect first only the north wing. That was completed in 1800 and congress, the court and the library moved in. "The Oven," a temporary round brick structure, was put up the next year on the site of the house wing, the permanent structure of which was not finished until 1811, three years before both wings were burned by the British. After repairs had been made, work was begun on the rotunda, and the capitol visioned by Thornton was completed in 1827.

It then proved adequate until shortly before the Civil war, when it became necessary to build the present senate and house extensions. Subsequently the library was given a building of its own, and large office buildings were erected for senators and representatives. The library and the house office building are already overcrowded.

When the senate moved into its extension in 1859, the Supreme court acquired the old senate chamber, and only recently have its members been willing to contemplate leaving that room where Webster, Clay, Calhoun, many of the great of the early republic, made history with words. A new site has been selected for a Supreme court building east of the capitol, near the Library of Congress.

Depicts Future Man as Bodily Ugly, Brainy

Philadelphia.—"A bald-headed, toothless, chinless, thin-shouldered, spindle-legged individual," was the futuristic portrait of the average person of the next generation painted for the Philadelphia Physical Education association by James E. Rogers, director of the National Physical Education Service of New York city.

But the man of the future, though he may have lost all claim to beauty, will be well equipped with brains, Mr. Rogers added.

The one way to avoid having his futuristic sketch become a reality, the speaker added, was for the present generation to return to its "natural heritage of climbing, swimming and running." He indicated that a school day lengthened to conform with the present business day, to provide a more complete recreation program and foster "educational athletics as against spectator athletics," would be a welcome step in American educational methods.

45 Days on Trail to Get to Seat in Legislature

Nome, Alaska. — State legislators who complain of over-night travel to reach the capital, have only one forty-fifth the troubles of Thomas Gaffney, representative-elect to the Alaska legislature. Gaffney is now mushing outbound from here with dogs. When he reaches Nenana behind his team he will take the government railroad to Seward. From there it is a steamer ride to Juneau. The legislature convenes at Juneau the first Tuesday in March and Gaffney calculates with 45 days start to just about make it.

London Street Is Paved With Blocks of Rubber

Washington.—The first thoroughfare to be constructed of rubber is now in use in London. Blocks consisting of rubber caps, vulcanized to a brick base, have been laid in New Bridge street, a road subjected to heavy traffic, and, according to cable reports to the Department of Commerce, have proved successful.

Famous Irish Castle Will Be Abandoned

Belfast.—A recent decision of the war office to abolish Carrickfergus castle as a military station makes very uncertain the future of one of the most historic spots in the British Isles.

The castle is situated on the shore of Belfast lough and was founded in 1128 by Sir John de Courcy, one of the Norman invaders, and was for centuries the scene of much strife between Ireland and England.

King William the Third landed there in 1690 on his way to the Boyne and some years later the French privateer Thurot was captured there.

U. S. LONGEST TUNNEL NEARING COMPLETION

Greatest Engineering Feat of Modern Times.

Tolland, Colo.—When drillers boring from each side of the Continental divide near Tolland meet in the center of James peak within the next few weeks, consummation of one of the greatest engineering feats of modern times will have taken place.

A force of 700 men is laboring daily to rush completion of the gigantic project known as Moffatt tunnel this spring. When finished it will extend slightly more than six miles, making it the longest tunnel in the United States. Passing directly under one of the highest peaks of the Continental divide, it will open up the long isolated Moffatt country, a virgin territory larger than the state of New York, and will save approximately twelve hours' running time between Denver and Salt Lake City, on opposite side of the Rocky mountain range.

To Be Ready July 1.

Unless more unforeseen difficulties arise, the tunnel will be ready for the first train to pass through it on July 1.

At present trains crossing the divide are forced to climb a winding mountain trail more than 30 miles long before they arrive at Corona, on top of the range, 11,666 feet above sea level. Trains passing through Corona, a town which consists merely of a telegraph operator's hut, entirely inclosed by a snow shed, move on the highest standard-gauge tracks in the world.

For several months in the year traffic often is stopped for days at a time because of heavy snowfalls on the right of way. The chief operating expense of the line, according to its annual report, is caused by the necessity for almost constant use of snow-removal equipment.

When the Moffatt tunnel is completed all of these difficulties will be eliminated. Trains will travel on almost level ground until they come to the entrance of the tunnel. There they will start climbing a gentle grade straight through the Continental divide and more than two miles below ground. When they get to the middle of the tunnel the grade will change and they will gradually go downward and out into the open country beyond.

The tunnel, expected to cost $10,000,000 before it is completed, is being financed by the counties it will serve. The railroad using the bore, in turn, will repay the counties affected. The rental scale will be graduated to provide for the expected increased earning capacity of the road after the new route has been in use several years.

Almost insurmountable difficulties have been passed so far by engineers constructing the mammoth hole. Such obstacles as soft rock, requiring extensive and permanent timbering, and underground rivers, which had to be pumped away, have faced the contractors almost constantly.

Strike Subterranean River.

At one place, for instance, an unknown subterranean river was struck. It filled the tunnel as rapidly as the pumps would empty it. Finally it was noticed that Crater lake, high up in the mountains, was becoming lower. Engineers dropped several tons of coloring matter into the lake. When they went down to the tunnel they discovered that the water swirling through it was the same color as that in the lake above. The lake almost vanished before the contractors were able to stop its rushing flow through the tunnel.

Some idea of the stupendous size of the project may be gained from the latest construction figures. Seven hundred miles of holes have been drilled; 2,500,000 pounds of blasting powder used; 11,000,000 board feet of timber, corresponding to 2,000 miles of planks an inch thick and a foot wide, have been put in place; 800,000 pounds of drill steel have been consumed, and more than 3,000,000,000 tons of rock have been removed.

Alberta's Silver Foxes Found of High Value

Clairmont, Alb.—Silver foxes reared in the Peace river country of northern Alberta are attaining a remarkable reputation for quality, and fox farms in many sections of the United States and Canada now have stock taken from this district.

Alfred Fraser, a prominent New Yorker, once saw in New York four pelts from the ranch of F. E. Turner of Clairmont consigned to London, and was so struck with their quality that he delegated a representative to the Peace river country to secure live silver foxes. A big trade has since been built up in supplying breeding foxes. Last year Turner shipped 80 consignments to all parts of the continent.

100 Eagles Attack Flock of Sheep, Kill Forty-two

Moscow.—A great flock of mountain eagles, darkening the sky, swooped down on the meadows of the Dagestan republic and killed forty-two sheep in one mass attack, according to word received by the Soviet commissary of agriculture. The terrified shepherds, accustomed to beating off the attacks of single eagles, fled when the big birds descended on their flocks in mass formation. It was estimated that at lease 100 eagles participated in the raid from the sky.

TENANTS CHARGED BY YARD IN RUSSIA

Landlord Also Considers the Size of Salaries.

Moscow.—In Russia rooms are rented by the yard and paid for on the basis of a tenant's weekly wage. Bolshevism has evolved a rent law unparalleled anywhere else.

The commissioner of health established a minimum space necessary for a wholesome life for one person. This is called the "minimum norm." Any worker is entitled to this living space, and pays for it in proportion to his salary.

When two or more persons live together, all earning money, the rate of rent for their room is fixed by the largest salary earned by one of its inhabitants. This makes the "nepmen," or private business men, extremely unpopular as tenants, because it drives up the rent of all in their apartments to the higher level of their incomes.

But the "nepmen" are popular among co-operative house-building organizations, of which there are now 450 in Moscow. To make both ends meet on the small payment of $50 required of members of co-operatives, one-tenth of the available living space in co-operative houses usually is sold or rented to nonmembers. Naturally, "nepmen" are preferred because, compared to others, they have such a large amount of money.

Besides what they can get from the "nepmen," the housing co-operatives are assisted by state funds, which are generally loaned to them at 2 per cent interest, with repayment in forty-five years.

The "minimum norm" officially declared able to support one life in good condition is fixed at about 7 by 7 feet, which can under certain conditions be increased to about 10 by 10 feet. Many concessions and exceptions are made, such as for students, whose rent is only five cents a month for each "minimum norm" they occupy.

Tapestries, Once Pope's, May Come to New York

New York.—Tapestries which once decorated the palace of a pope, and which are valued at $300,000, soon may be hung in St. Patrick's cathedral here. The World learned recently that wealthy New York Catholics are considering purchase of one or more of the tapestries for presentation to the cathedral.

Woven in the Seventeenth century on the pre-Gobelin looms of De la Planche from designs drawn by Rubens, the set was presented by Louis XIII of France to Cardinal Barberini, who later became Pope Urban VIII. For years they hung in the Barberini palace at Rome.

The set, of which seven survive, were brought to this country by Mrs. Rosa Lewis, English hotel owner, who acquired them from Mrs. Benjamin Guiness of the English brewing family, who bought them from the descendants of the Barberini family. Mrs. Lewis brought them here to sell, and has already received offers for individual pieces, but it is hoped to keep the whole set together.

The seven tapestries, all excellently preserved, represent scenes from the life of the Emperor Constantine, first Christian ruler of the world. Nearly a century was needed to complete the entire set, one of the first famous tapestries made in France.

The sum needed to purchase the tapestries would be about $300,000. Until they are sold five of them are on exhibition at the Grand Central Art galleries.

Says Friends Know You by Noise of Your Face

London.—"It is possible to distinguish your face from other people's faces by the noise it makes," said J. L. Baird, the televisor inventor, in a lecture here the other night. He then proceeded to demonstrate.

He explained that he had discovered that transmissions of pictures by the television system were received as sounds by telephone or radiophone, each object or scene having its corresponding vibration.

In his demonstration he used pictures of various persons, and then of a matchbox, a pair of scissors, a hat and a cabbage. One face made a sound like a saw, another like a pneumatic riveter, while the hat purred softly. The cabbage's image emitted a noise like a man gargling.

These sounds, Mr. Baird said, formed permanent records from which the original images could be reproduced.

Factory Hands Better Paid Than Office Help

New York.—Factory workers and other manual laborers receive an average higher wage than office employees, according to a survey of the national industrial conference board, made public here recently. Weekly wages of the first type of employees averaged $2 a week more than those of clerical workers, the analysis revealed. The office salary study was based on earnings in twenty occupational classifications of office workers. The data for the survey was gathered in eighteen cities and was collected separately for men and women.

Winter chills bring varied ills

—the time good elimination is most important

COLDS, chills and changes in temperature impose extra strain on our kidneys. Sluggishness of function is apt to permit some retention of body-poisons in the blood and make one more susceptible to the ills of winter. Presence of this unfiltered waste makes one listless, tired and achy—causes drowsy headaches, dizziness and often a toxic backache. Disturbed function is often evidenced by scanty or burning secretions. At such times a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys is indicated. Doan's Pills have been winning friends for more than forty years. Ask your neighbor!

After 15 Years Rid of Rheumatism

Muscles and joints attacked, Bismarck, N. D., man endured 15 years of agony. Health undermined, tries Tanlac and wins back former strength

"At times I could not move about or raise my arms," said B. F. Burbage, 309 Fourth St., Bismarck, N. D. "I was practically crippled, and every movement caused excruciating pains. When these bad spells came on I had to quit business altogether, as I could not attend to it.

"Other distressing conditions developed in my system. My heart bothered me a lot and my nerves were unstrung. My appetite just died; I had no desire for food. My whole system just seemed to slump. After 15 years I was in a bad way.

"I tried about everything in that time and finally in 1923 decided to give Tanlac a trial. The first few bottles helped me so well that I kept on taking Tanlac and improved right along. At last I was completely well again, free from all pain and feeling strong and robust for the first time in 15 years. Since then my joints and muscles have been free from the slightest twinge of pain. The rheumatism is out of my system, I'm eating well and have put on 15 lbs. I recommend Tanlac with unbounded confidence."

Mr. Burbage is but one of thousands helped to rugged health by Tanlac. In our files are over a hundred thousand letters from grateful folks who credit Tanlac for their vigorous health. It is nature's own remedy made from roots, herbs and barks. Your own druggist has Tanlac. Over 52 million bottles already sold.

THE FALLS AND LELIA

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

"I 'LOW it's a big hindrance," the farmer admitted, nodding at the falls beside which Reid had paused. "But it isn't more than four feet or maybe five. A wire nettin' could be put in to keep the fish—"

"What fish?" in surprise.

"Ain't that what you want to buy my farm for to get the river or growin' fish?"

"Never had the least idea of such a thing."

"But you said you'd like to own the farm just for the sake of having the stream. My daughter Lelia—"

"Oh, I think I understand. Lelia did say something about $10,000 offered for the farm, and I answered the stream alone was worth far more, and I'd be glad to have it myself at so reasonable a price."

"Well," triumphantly, "don't that mean fish? I'm a man who can put two and two together. There's a new city bobbin' up seven miles down yonder that's got to 10,000 people already, an' one two miles nearer that's up to 4,000. That's the market. An' here's the fish supply—a stream that's fifteen feet wide an' most as deep, an' a quarter of a mile long, on my own land. That would grow fish to supply—well, everybody who'd like fish.

"The trouble is, Mr. Reid, you've got someth'ng up your sleeve. Maybe you're holdin' off to get the land cheap. I don't know except that it's something to do with this stream. You've walked up an' down, up an' down, often with my daughter Lelia, but sometimes by yourself. An' always you stop at this falls an' look. I know what it means. You think fish would go over, or maybe high water come up an' wash 'em over. But it could be fixed some way, I guess. If you'd be open with me like I am with you, we could come to a pleasant an' friendly understandin'. An' I'd make my price right."

"Yet you tried to sell to me for $15,000 the other day when you never asked any one else over $10,000," smiled Reid.

"Of course," frankly, "which really would be cheaper. I've always held the stream a detriment, cutting the land in two so. We never took any account of fish. So the land itself is figured at $10,000. But you say the fish stream is worth more than the land, so $15,000 is cheap to you for both."

"I see. Well, the fact is, I wouldn't give you $1,000 for the farm, because I don't want it. I wouldn't take the stream packed with fish as a gift, and I wouldn't give a rap for the stream itself except as it tumbles over the rocks here."

The farmer stared and his face began to grow red. Then you've just been foolin' around here fishin'—or," suddenly and explosively, "to be with my daughter Lelia."

Reid raised a deprecatory hand. "Wait a minute, Mr. Powell," he urged, "and I'll be perfectly frank with you also. First, I haven't the money to buy your farm and stream, even if I wanted to, except through a syndicate behind me. I am merely an electrician, reconnoitering for the syndicate which is furnishing light and power for the two growing cities. They want to produce cheaper in order to make lower rates to consumers, see?"

"Not a bit," grimly. "My mind's on you, my daughter Lelia, the farm an' the stream. You'll have to be frank harder."

Reid laughed. "I'm being frank by leading up with all the facts so you'll understand perfectly," he explained. "The first day I came out was merely a day off for fishing, with no thought of business. Several options on water power are being considered by the company and I am waiting. The principal stockholder has been away. I came out this morning for another look before making my final report and advice."

"Lookin' for it in the stream, are you? Or maybe walkin' along the bank. But Lelia went to town shoppin'."

"I know. I met her."

"An' still came on out! She won't be back till long after dark, an' her brother Tom's with her. They're goin' to stay in for a picture show."

"So Tom told me. We were talking about electricity. He wants to learn, and I've agreed to take him on with me. He seems a very promising young fellow, and besides, your daughter Lelia asked me. And oh, yes, there's going to be an unusually fine play tomorrow, and Lelia and Tom have promised to go with me. We'd like you also. I told them I would see and ask you today. Lelia said she knew you'd like the play. Will you join us? I'll run out with my car. There'll be plenty of room."

"Huh!" suspiciously. "I don't quite like the way you speak my daughter Lelia's name—just the same as you say Tom, but with a difference."

"With a difference, certainly," agreed Reid, emphatically. "Lelia's promised to be my wife, and Tom's only her brother."

There were stumps all about them. The farmer seated himself on one and motioned Reid to another. "Now take your time and tell it all over, just like you were tellin' something," he urged.

"There isn't any trouble about the falls," assured Reid. "It's just what I want—or the company wants. Now I'm to enter the family, suppose I speak a little more intimately. I understand from what I've heard and a few things Lelia said that the farm is mortgaged for nearly all it's worth and that your anxiety to sell is on that account."

"Yes," admitted the farmer, "it's growin' too heavy a burden. I'd rather have a little place clear than this big one to keep on worrying over. I hoped you considered buyin', hangin' round the stream so. I didn't connect Lelia with it then."

"I've found and got options on three water powers for the company at $12,000, $15,000 and $17,000, and not one of them is as good as yours, that I came upon by accident. And it's only seven miles from the larger town," said Reid.

"But seven miles is seven miles," considered the farmer, curiously. "Isn't that too far for any good? I never counted the stream anything but a detriment, and the falls is the one bad spot in the stream."

"Not so bad, but I'm ready to make an offer of $17,000 for it, with riparian rights along the stream. Your power is so much better than the others that I know the sale is a sure thing. Seven miles isn't far for electricity. We would build a power house and run wires to the two towns to carry it. And we'd want perhaps 200 feet on either side of the stream to hold the water our dam will raise. And if I might add a suggestion, I would advise not selling another acre of the farm. The two cities are growing rapidly and before many years the farm is sure to be very valuable."

"Sell any more land—I guess not!" exploded the farmer. "I was only offerin' it for sale because I felt obliged to. But with $17,000 I'll pay off the mortgage an' have $9,000 left for more stock an' buildin's. An' now, 'bout that play. I've never been to one in all my life an' never felt I wanted to. But mebbe that's narrow-minded. So I guess I'll help to fill the automobile tomorrow night. That automobile was another question I had meant to ask, but we'll let it go now."

"I suppose you mean why I go to the expense of a car when I haven't the means to buy the farm myself, as I just confessed. The fact is, the company made me a present of a nice machine in recognition of some service I did them. My work involves a good deal of going about, so the upkeep of the car goes into the company's expense. Anything more?"

"No, except you may tell Lelia it's all right!"

No More Sentimental Pictures for Daddy

The family had just returned from one of the downtown motion-picture theaters, where that week a film was being shown that portrayed the burning love of desert sands. The wife and mother was still enraptured with the smooth courtesies of the screen lovers when her little daughter, age six, came and kissed her as she sat for a moment in the living room before preparing for bed.

"Mother," asked the little one after she had implanted the fond kiss, "Why didn't you close your eyes when you kissed me."

Father, who was hanging up his coat, appeared not to hear the daughter's question, which had the effect of startling the mother almost out of her chair. But he let it be known that he had not missed a thing when a day or so later the family asked to see another "movie."

"Not on your life," he answered. "We're through with these sentimental love pictures. I'll take you all to see a good western film, though."—Indianapolis News.

Mr. Bilton, the new resident in Colstead, was inspecting, in company with his architect, the palatial mansion he had built.

When they arrived at the second floor Mr. Bilton discovered something he did not understand.

"Here," he cried to the architect. "Why, in the name of Mike, have you put that top step above the floor level?"

"Well, sir," came the answer, "you said that you wanted all modern improvements, and that's the step a person reaches for when he gets to the top of the stairs in the dark!"

"Big Ben" a "Dumbell"

Winston Churchill in his book about the war, from which extracts have been appearing in the Times, makes great play with the striking of 11 o'clock on November 11. A letter to the Times follows from a correspondent who points out that "Big Ben" in sober fact never struck 11 o'clock that day at all—it had been stopped for many months for war purposes, and could not be put in motion again in time for the great event. Mr. Churchill will have widespread sympathy, at all events in Fleet street. There, but for the grace of God, goes any journalist. —London Saturday Review.

Accommodation Train

The little boy had gone to the railway station to see his father off on a visit. Amid the usual farewells, kisses, and waving handkerchiefs, the train pulled out, and the youngster gazed after it until it had disappeared. Presently a locomotive came in sight with a train of the same length as the one that had taken his father away, and as it entered the station he clapped his hands excitedly. "Mamma! Mamma!" he shouted. "Here comes the train back again! Papa forgot something."

This age of high standards welcomes the Camel quality

MODERN smokers are the most exacting ever known, and they place Camel first among cigarettes.

For Camel was created to succeed in the hardest-to-please age ever known. It was made to satisfy those who demand the utmost, and modern smokers have given it such popularity as no other cigarette ever had.

If you're downright hard to please, just try Camels. Tobacco taste and fragrance will be revealed as never before, for Camels are rolled of the choicest Turkish and Domestic tobaccos, supremely blended. This modern cigarette exceeds all other standards but its own. To light one is to find taste fulfilment. "Have a Camel!"

He'll exterminate us all! He stepped in Peterman's!

RIGHT! He will exterminate them all!

Peterman's Roach Food exterminates every roach in your house.

It entices roaches from their hiding places. They carry it on their legs and bodies back to their nests. They wriggle over all the others there, over their young and their eggs.

Every one dies and disintegrates. No odor. Nothing is left but a little dry dust.

Don't try to fight roaches with a spray. No spray can possibly reach the roaches, the young and the eggs far behind the baseboards and under the floors.

Only the right powder can do that.

Peterman's Roach Food is the right powder.

Here is the right insecticide for each insect:

PETERMAN'S ROACH FOOD—exterminates cockroaches.

PETERMAN'S ANT FOOD—exterminates ants.

FLYOSAN—kills flies and mosquitoes.

PETERMAN'S DISCOVERY—exterminates bed-bugs.

PETERMAN'S MOTH FOOD—protects against moths.

You must have a specific insecticide for each insect. No single insecticide will exterminate them all. We have had nearly 50 years' experience. We know that is true.

Peterman's has the right insecticide for each insect. On sale wherever drugs are sold.

I was tired all the time. I think my trouble was coming on me for six months before I realized it. I read of your wonderful medicine in the paper, and * * * my husband bought me a bottle, and after the first few doses I felt better, so kept on taking it until I was well and strong. I take it at times when I feel tired and it helps me. I will always have a good word for your medicine and tell anyone what good it has done me. I recommended it to my neighbor for her girl, who is sixteen years old, and it was just what she needed. She is feeling fine now, and goes to school every day."—Mrs. E. F. CHAPTER VIII—Continued

—12—

"Time enough to draw a gun and back it up with a few sentences. It bears out what I've thought from the start—not an accidental meeting, but a date, to which the woman came unsuspecting and the other primed to kill."

"Then Mrs. Stokes got on to that date," said Williams, "and broke in on it. And there's only one person that date could have been with—Stokes."

Bassett's nerves were raw with strain and anxiety. This reiteration of a rendezvous with Stokes maddened him:

"But it could't have been. I've told you. I knew Miss Saunders well. I know what she felt about the man, and besides I have the evidence of my own eyes that she avoided him in every way she could. Make an appointment to meet him alone! She'd as soon make an appointment with Satan."

Neither of the men answered him for a moment. Rawson was impressed; he had formed a high opinion of the director's candor and truthfulness and his words weighed with him:

"I go a good deal by what you say, Mr. Bassett, and as to this meeting of which I'm convinced—whom it was with I don't know. Williams here has made up his mind and worked out his case. I don't agree with him. I believe Mrs. Stokes is telling the truth. What she says hangs together all right. That she may know something is possible, but I don't think she's guilty."

"Then you must think it's Stokes," said Williams with some heat. "There's nobody else it could be."

Rawson considered before he spoke:

"I don't see Stokes as deliberately murdering the woman he was in love with. That's generally an act of impulse, sudden desperation. And there was no impulse here. Careful premeditation—the stealing of the revolver, luring her to this summer house, the threats or rage when she got here that made her fly. It's more like the working out of revenge than the act of blind passion. Stokes doesn't look to me the kind of man that would kill so carefully. He's too soft."

"Then who is it?" Williams exclaimed. "Somebody killed her."

Rawson moved toward the doorway:

"That's about all I'm willing to agree to at present. But I'd like to see Stokes again. He and his wife may know more than they say—I don't deny that—but she's got a better nerve than he has. We'll get him into the library and have a whack at him."

CHAPTER IX

Bassett was detailed to find Stokes and bring him to the library. A summons from the director would have an air of informality which might put Stokes off his guard.

Bassett found Flora and Shine on the balcony and heard that Stokes had gone to his room to try to get some sleep. He knocked on the door and to a gruff "Come in" entered to find Stokes lying on the bed. He rose quickly, exhibiting the same alacrity his wife had shown earlier in the day.

"Of course," he said. "I'm ready to come whenever they want me. In fact I've been lying here expecting it, going back over last evening, trying to think of anything I may have overlooked that might help them."

There was a willing bruskness in his manner, an almost hearty readiness to do what was asked of him that seemed not quite genuine, adopted, perhaps, to hide the natural nervousness of a person in his position. Seated in an easy chair before the two men, Bassett back of them by the window, noticed that his hands were restless, smoothing and pulling at his clothes, settling his tie. Despite his disquiet he assumed an attitude of expectant attention, gravely awaiting their will, his eyes glancing from one to the other. He might readily have been a guilty man primed for attack, or an innocent one shaken by the untoward circumstances in which he found himself.

Rawson's manner was friendly and reassuring. They wanted to get all possible information on the movements of the company the evening before. They would like to know just what he had done from the time he entered the house to change his clothes to the time when he had heard the shot.

He answered promptly with businesslike directness. Went to his room, changed his clothes, laid on the bed, resting for a while, then sat on the balcony reading the paper.

While he was sitting there Miss Saunders must have passed the end of the balcony by the path that led to the Point.

She must have, but he had not seen her, being occupied with his paper.

Had he while in the house seen Miss Saunders or heard her voice?

He had not. He had no idea she had come in.

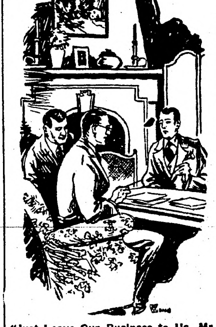
Had he seen his wife?

"My wife? Yes, I saw her for a moment. In the hall when I came out of our room after dressing."

"She said nothing to you about Miss Saunders being in the house?"

"Why no, she didn't know it. We didn't mention Miss Saunders at all."

"But she was—she had been—a frequent subject of conversation between you?"



"Just Leave Our Business to Us, Mr. Stokes."

His eyes, looking at Rawson, seemed to harden and grow more fixed:

"We had talked of her—naturally, being in the same company."

"Your wife and Miss Saunders were not very friendly?"

A fierce light rose in the fixed eyes, the nostrils widened.

"What are you getting at, Mr. Rawson?"

"Our business, Mr. Stokes. We're here to investigate a murder and we can't spare people's feelings or shut our eyes to disagreeable facts."

"Have I shown any signs of expecting that? I've put myself at your disposal, my wife has. We're ready to give you any help we can, but I'm not ready to back up any d—d suspicions that have been put into your mind."

"We're not asking you to," said Rawson. "But we know what was going on here before the shooting."

Bassett spoke up:

"I'm the person that told them, Aleck. It had to be done. They had to be acquainted with the whole situation, and they got it from me. But they heard no lies, no suppositions—you know you can trust me for that."

Stokes' glance shifted to him. Through its savage defiance Bassett could detect the torment of his soul, despairingly betrayed to the one person he knew would be just.

"Oh, I'm not blaming you," he answered. "You couldn't do anything else. And they can hear it all from me." He looked at the two men. "I'm willing to tell. I was in love with her, madly, like a fool, hounded her, dogged her footsteps. You've heard that. And my wife was jealous—so jealous they all could see. You've heard that, too."

The confession of his passion, remorseless in its bitter revelation, was horrible, like the tearing aside of wrappings from a raw wound.

"Yes, we've heard it," muttered Williams.

"She hated me. I don't know whether you've heard that, too, but I'm telling you and perhaps you'll believe what I say if it's against myself. She hated me, and I wouldn't let her alone. My wife was jealous. Do you see—is it clear? Oh, we're in d—d bad, my wife and I, but we're not in so bad as you're trying to make out." He jumped to his feet, the shine of sweat on his forehead.

"I don't see, Mr. Stokes," said Rawson quietly, "where you get that. We haven't made out anything yet."

"Oh, I can see. We were the only people outside the house—that's enough to build a theory on. And motives—who had a motive? That's the way you go to work. Find a motive, fit someone to it. My wife had a motive, that's sufficient. Don't ask what kind of woman she is, don't look any further, you have to get someone and she's the easiest."

"Mr. Stokes, if you'd take this calmly—"

"Calmly! Seeing what you think and where you're trying to land us! But just let me ask you something. Do you happen to remember there were five hundred people on the island that afternoon? Any kind of person could have been here on any kind of errand."

Rawson answered with a slight show of impatience: "Just leave our business to us, Mr. Stokes. You're here to answer questions."

"Oh, that's plain—questions all pointing one way. But there were other people on the island besides that crowd—besides us—who might have had a motive. Isn't anger a motive?"

"Anger!" ejaculated Williams. "Where does that come in?"

"Here, on Gull island. Oh, we've had more than jealousy. Rage and spite will go as far. Take your eyes off my wife and me for a moment—look somewhere else."

Rawson's face showed no surprise, blankly inscrutable, but Williams wheeled in his chair and turned an expression of startled inquiry on Bassett. Bassett, in his turn, was staring in astonishment at Stokes.

"What are you talking about?" he said. "Rage and spite—whom do you mean?"

"I mean Joe Tracy," was the answer.

"Joe Tracy!" exclaimed Williams, looking vaguely about in a baffled searching of memory. "Who's he?"

"Good God, Aleck!" Bassett made a step forward: "Get a hold on yourself—think of what you're saying. He wasn't here, he'd left the island before that."

Stokes paid no attention but went on, glaring into Rawson's expressionless face:

"A d—d devil of a boy with a record. Ask him," he pointed to Bassett, "ask any of them what kind he was and how he acted here. It isn't I alone that saw it. Yesterday morning at the rehearsal he'd have struck her if Bassett hadn't interfered. What was the matter—I don't know. I don't pretend to know everything, but I know rage and hate when I see them."

"Aleck, you're crazy," Bassett's voice was raised in exasperated insistence: "He'd gone."

"Couldn't he come back? Aren't there boats to be hired at Hayworth?" He turned to Rawson. "I don't accuse him, I'm not like you, I don't jump at conclusions, point and say, 'There's the murderer!' But I want a square deal and I won't get it till you've looked up Joe Tracy. Call your dogs back from the scent they're on and put them on his. Justice—that's all I ask for—justice for my wife. For myself—" He stopped. His excitement seemed suddenly to die. He looked old and wearied, his body relaxed, the fire in his sunken eyes extinguished in a profound gloom. "It doesn't matter what happens to me. I've thrown everything away—and Sybil's dead."

There was a slight pause. Rawson broke it, clearing his throat and rising from his chair:

"That's enough for the time being, Mr. Stokes. You can go now, if we want you we'll call on you later!"

Without a word Stokes turned and left the room. When the door had closed on him, Bassett said:

"He's out of his mind—Joe Tracy—when he knows he wasn't here."

Williams gave a bearish shrug:

"Oh, pshaw, what's the matter with him's easy to size up. Breaking down, losing his nerve. Whether he knows his wife did it or not he sees everything points there and he's just laying hold of anything to mark time. They go like that—I've seen 'em before."

Rawson, who had been standing with his hands deep in his pockets and his eyes fixed on the floor, moved to the chair:

"Let's hear about this boy, Mr. Bassett—all this anger and hate business he's been buzzing round."

He sat down and lit a cigar. Through the smoke he watched Bassett with a narrowed glance as the director unfolded the story of Joe, the quarrel and Sybil's accusation.

When it was over Rawson knocked the ash from his cigar, meditatively looking at the crumbling gray heap:

"Are you under the impression, Mr. Bassett, that her story was true—that the boy had been spying on her?"

"I don't know. Of course she was in a high-keyed emotional state that might engender unjust suspicions. On the other hand you couldn't trust his word, and there was big money offered."

"And when you returned to New York you would have found it out."

"Yes, I told him that."

"And he would have realized that it would go hard with him, where you were concerned, and with the rest of the profession?"

"Yes, he'd know. She was very popular and there was a general sympathy for her."

Williams stretched and rose from his chair:

"Well, it's all right to gather up everything, but it doesn't get us any further. If the boy'd been here, seeing what he was and how he felt, there might be something in it. But as he got out before the shooting it leaves us just where we were before. What do you think about going up and looking over that top story—routine business we ought to get through."

"Not now," Rawson moved to the door. "I'm going across to the mainland."

"Mainland—what's that for?"

"Look up some things—that boy's movements, for one. I'll take Patrick and the launch and send him right back. Come down to the dock with me, Mr. Bassett, and tell me which way Tracy was going."

Bassett went with him feeling for the first time that he could give information with the tranquilizing assurance it would react on nobody. When he left Rawson at the dock he went to look for Anne.

Wives Should Be Picked

Dr. Thomas Galloway, noted biologist, says if social hygiene were interpreted correctly and taught with kindness and careful guidance, young men would learn how to pick mates instead of marrying for infatuation. "Clear understanding of life would eliminate a large number of marriage failures. Divorces would fall off. I do not mean, however, that marriage is a failure, for there are fewer matrimonial failures in proportion to business failures. Marriage is a sound institution."—Capper's Weekly.

THE WEDDING DRESS

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

ROSE CARLTON sat at the window of her room with a book of poems in her lap and a bit of crochet-work in her slender white hands. She read a few lines of poetry and meditated upon them while she took a few stitches.

She was making a blue bootee for a tiny foot, fashioning it as tenderly as if she knew the soft shape it would inclose. In reality she never saw any of the babies who wore her bootees. She made them for a certain shop and received pay for them. Not that she needed the money she thus earned. Indeed, she gave it away and a great deal more with it. But she liked to be busy. She hated cards and she could not read all the time.

Across the narrow alleyway the shade of the opposite window was lifted. Rose could look into a small room and see everything it contained. It was altogether a different room than hers—no pictures, books, bits of china and lace and silverware. Rose had brought to her room many intimate treasures gathered through a long lifetime. The room opposite was bare and ugly with but one window. Yet a girl appeared at the window. She opened a small sewing table and spread some material. Upon the cloth she laid a pattern. She was preparing to make herself a dress.

As she stood pondering the task before her she made Rose think of the figure on one of her old-fashioned candlesticks—the particular figure that was topped with a golden head and had blue eyes. Rose loved blue eyes and golden hair, although her own eyes were dusky and the hair that was gray now had been black. She felt an instant interest in this young girl. Why was she making a white organdie dress in January? Not for a party; she did not look like a girl who needed party frocks. It must be that she was going to get married!

Rose grew so interested that she forgot both her work and her book. She did not want to seem curious or too observant, but the sight at the next window fascinated her.

Suddenly the girl glanced up and saw her. She smiled, shook her head a little, thus making Rose aware that either there was too much pattern or too little cloth. Rose smiled back encouragingly. She was sure now it was a wedding dress the girl was trying to make. A girl with a face as sweet as that would need a wedding dress.

The book of poems fell from Rose's lap. She grew thoughtful. When at last the girl rolled up goods and pattern she sighed deeply. The pattern had proved too much for that skimpy bit of cloth after all.

The girl had disappeared from the window. Could she be crying with disappointment? Rose felt she must know. She took her binoculars from the table beside her. She hated to do it, it made her no better than a spy, but she had to know whether tragedy was taking place in that little room opposite.

She turned the powerful lens full upon the unshaded window. And now the whole interior of the room was revealed to her.

It was even a poorer room than she had supposed. The bureau was battered, the wall paper faded, the bed wretchedly thin. There were no adornments such as a girl loves—only a poor little kimono hanging from a hook on the door and a hat-tree holding a thin coat and a dark felt cloche. Oh, the piteousness of such a room to shelter so much youth and beauty!

And the girl—she was there on the floor, face downward, sobbing, her golden head on her arms.

Rose laid aside the glasses and rang the bell. The little maid who delighted to come at her summons appeared as by magic.

"Gladys," Rose said, "do you know anything about the house next door?"

Gladys shrugged her shoulders.

"It's a rooming house of a very poor sort, I'm afraid," she said.

"I want you to go on an errand for me, Gladys," Rose said. "Will you wait just outside the door a moment."

Rose took a ring of keys from the small bag she always carried and, rising, went to her mahogany chest of drawers. Selecting a key, she opened a drawer—opened it slowly. Her face was very grave and still as she removed the layers of tissue paper, scented with the sachet she loved.

Underneath was a package folded in blue paper to keep away light. She opened the blue paper and disclosed rich white satin that in all the years since it had been placed there had acquired only a faint creaminess. There were yards and yards of this satin, for the styles were more ample then. The piece had never been cut into.

From the same drawer she took a package of filmy lace, a package of pearl trimming. The lace and the trimming she placed with the satin and bound the whole into a neat parcel, securely tied. Then she sat down at her desk and wrote a few words upon a blank card. "Wishing you all happiness." This she tucked into a fold of the wrapping paper.

"Gladys!" she called and Gladys entered. "Take this to the next house. Ask for the girl who occupies a room on the second floor, right-hand side—a girl with blue eyes and golden hair. When she appears give her this. Tell her her fairy godmother sent it."

Rose closed the empty drawer, locked it and put the keys in her bag. She sat down and leaned her head against the chest of drawers as a memory, which had worn dim, overwhelmed her.

It was her wedding dress she had given away—the wedding dress which had never been made because the man she loved had been killed. He had been young and stalwart with blue eyes and golden hair—

She was aroused by a knock at the door. It was Gladys' returning, she thought.

Rose drew herself up and called, "Come!" The door opened and the golden-haired girl stood before her.

"I—I've came to try to thank my fairy godmother!" she faltered.

Instantly Rose was the charming and controlled hostess. She made the girl take a deep chair, she turned a button which conveyed the electric current to her little teakettle. She made tea and served it with cream and lump sugar and preserved ginger and delectable little cakes.

Refreshed, the girl began shyly to speak of herself. She was going to be married to the best young fellow that ever lived. She had made great plans for her trousseau, but—she had lost her job and it took all she had saved to keep her in room and food.

"I wouldn't let Carl know for worlds," she confided. "I couldn't let him buy my wedding things. That remnant of white organdie—I was so sure it would make me a dress when I bought it. But the pattern wouldn't fit. And—and I longed for white. A girl has only one wedding day in all her life. But now I shall wear satin and lace and pearl beads. Thanks to you. Oh, nothing so wonderful ever happened to any girl before, I am sure."

A week later Rose went to Evelyn's wedding. Rose gave her a wedding gift and kissed her. And Evelyn clung to her as if Rose had been her grandmother as well as her fairy godmother. They would not lose sight of each other hereafter.

Some day, Rose thought, as she returned to her crocheting, she would make a pair of blue bootees for baby's feet, which should have personal significance for her. She hoped this particular baby would have blue eyes and golden hair.

She smiled happily over her poetry and her crochet work.

Pretty Speech Almost Made Up for Failure

She came from an office building on Grand avenue with a wan smile on her lips and a twinkle in her eyes.

"Make it? Then why the mirth," asked her waiting friend.

"Gallantry such as his," announced the Tired Business Woman, "sweetens even the bitter cup of failure."

She had been trying to swing an important deal. She had called on her client so often that she knew the elderly elevator "boy" by name.

It was "Good morning, William," "Howdy do, Miss," between them several times a week.

That day the deal fell through. Turning to the waiting elevator, feeling old, stooped and wrinkled like William, she met a radiant young creature, fair and cherished. Once she had been young like that, though never so fair.

"Who was that pretty girl?" the Tired Business Woman asked William.

"Who? Where?" He came slowly from his far visions. "I don't know, miss. I didn't see her. But she ain't one bit prettier than you are!"—Kansas City Star.

Jefferson at Church

Although Thomas Jefferson was not a communicant of any church, he frequently attended the Episcopal services at Charlottesville. For many years there was no church building in the vicinity and the courthouse was the only place of worship. The four leading denominations in the county divided the Sabbaths equally among them, the Episcopalians, as well as the other three denominations, holding services every fourth Sunday. Mr. Jefferson used to come down from his mountain home at Monticello on horseback, bringing his seat with him. This seat consisted of a light folding chair of his own invention. He would enter the courthouse with the device under his arm, unfold it, place it on the floor and then sit down among the others.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Cautious Sinner

Nellie, a small English girl of whom Punch tells us, had been so naughty at the dinner table that she had been banished to her room. Her indulgent mother subsequently sent word to her by the maid that if she were repentant and would promise to be a good girl she might come down for the pudding.

The maid returned without Nellie.

"Did you tell Miss Nellie what I said?" inquired Miss Nellie's mamma.

"Yes'm" said the maid.

"Well, what did she say?"

"She said, 'What sort of pudding is it?'"—Youth's Companion.

Camelot

Camelot is the name given to a legendary spot in England where King Arthur was said to have had his palace and court, and where the Round table was. Shakespeare alludes to it in "Lear," Act II., scene 2, line 79. Several other writers, also allude to it, and try to fix its location.

Capell maintained that Camelot was Winchester or near Winchester, England. Caxton locates it in Wales. Tennyson alludes to Camelot in "The Lady of Shalott" and in the "Idylls."

Roosevelt Knew Secret

One of the secrets of Theodore Roosevelt's active life and strenuous disposition was his ability to thoroughly relax for 15 minutes at a time during the course of a hard day's work. He had the facility of ceasing to work, throwing himself back in a chair and relaxing. This relaxation, according to physicians, was as good as an hour's sleep. Few men could detach themselves from worry and strain for short periods as did Roosevelt.

Workers Finding More Time for Recreation

The five-day week has been a bugbear to many an employer, but think how near we have come to it already. A hundred years ago the workman labored for 12 hours a day for six days a week, and in return got shelter, food and clothing and not much of any of them. Now, in many industries, the 44-hour week is common, so that the step to 40 hours is short.

And the employers' habits have changed. The afternoon off for golf, the winter vacation in addition to one in the summer, the week-end that begins on Friday afternoon—how many are shocked by these?

The sage Jacob Ruppert, owner of the New York American league baseball team, thinks his possession worth $3,000,000, due to the added leisure of Americans. And golf, he says, has added to the attendance at baseball parks. Interest in one has aroused interest in the other.—Nation's Business.

Your Druggist Says! Indigestion Must Go or Money Back

You are simply patching up your stomach when you take things that can only bring relief for a few hours at a time.

Why not build up your run-down stomach—make it strong and vigorous so that you can eat anything you want any time you want to without misery and distress?

Dare's Mentha Pepsin is what every sufferer from poor digestion or dyspepsia needs—a pleasant upbuilding elixir for the stomach.

Thousands of bottles of Dare's Mentha Pepsin are sold every day because it is an outstanding, supremely effective stomach elixir that druggists everywhere sell with the distinct understanding that if it doesn't do you more real good than anything you ever tried—get your money back.

Demand Dare's—no reputable druggist will offer you a substitute.

Hard and Soft Metals

Iridium, a metal belonging to the platinum group and often used on the tips of fountain pens, is the hardest pure metal known, recent tests have shown, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. Molybdenum is next and tungsten third. Of the common metals, nickel is the hardest, ranking fifth. The tests did not include alloys, such as those of steel with a high percentage of carbon, which ranks higher than any. The tests showed that thallium is the softest metal, being twenty-fourth on the scale, lead was twenty-third and tin twenty-second. Gold ranks as number eighteen, silver fifteen, copper eleven, and iron ten.

Says Dangerous Varicose Veins Can Be Reduced at Home

Rub Gently and Upward Toward the Heart as Blood in Veins Flows That Way.

If you or any relative or friends are worried because of varicose veins, or bunches, the best advice that anyone in this world can give you is to ask your druggist for an original two-ounce bottle of Moone's Emerald Oil (full strength) and apply night and morning to the swollen, enlarged veins. Soon you will notice that they are growing smaller and the treatment should be continued until the veins are of normal size. So penetrating and powerful is Emerald Oil that even Piles are quickly absorbed. Your druggist sells lots of it.

Some Questions Answered about Interstate Power Company
$7 Dividend Cumulative Preferred Stock

WHAT IS PREFERRED STOCK?
A share of Preferred Stock represents a part ownership in the Company's business. It has certain rights over other classes of stock. For instance, its dividends must be paid before any dividend is paid on the common stock. It also has preference over the common stock in case of liquidation.

What Does "CUMULATIVE" Mean?
Cumulative refers to the dividends and means that all dividends due on the stock from the time it is issued must be paid before any dividends are paid on the common stock.
The cumulative feature is an important safe-guard for Preferred Stockholders.

WHAT ARE DIVIDENDS?
Money paid to Stockholders out of a Company's earnings is called Dividends.

Are Dividends Guaranteed?
No. No Company honestly conducted can guarantee its dividends because any such so-called "guarantee" must rest upon the earning power of the Company itself, and who can guarantee that?

WILL THE PREFERRED STOCK Ever Pay Bigger Dividends?
No. The dividend rate is always fixed in high grade investments of this kind because of the safeguards around the issue—such as being Preferred, Cumulative, etc.

If, For Some Unforeseen Reason, A Dividend is Not Paid, What Happens?
The dividends on this Stock are CUMULATIVE. This means that if one or more dividends are not paid when due, they must later be paid in full before any dividends on the common stock are paid.
Many stocks are NOT cumulative but this Company's Preferred Stock has that special safeguard.

When are Dividends Paid On This Stock?
Dividend checks are mailed to stockholders every three months on January 1, April 1, July 1, and October 1.

How Do I Know That the Company Will Treat Me Fairly As A Stockholder?
Your knowledge of the standing and character of the Company should dispel any doubts on this score. The Company wants you as a partner primarily to increase the public friendship and good will which it enjoys. What could it gain by securing a large list of home shareholders and then not respecting their rights?

What Are You Going to Do with the Money from the Sale of Stock?
Large sums of money are required each year for the purchase of equipment to meet the growing demand for electricity. This requires the permanent investment of large sums of money, which must come from the sale of securities.

Where Can I Sell My Stock in Case I Need the Money?
Any representative of the Company will be glad to put you in touch with the proper Company official, who will assist you in selling your stock. The Company maintains a resale department for the benefit of local stockholders who may wish to sell their shares.

Fishermen Victims of Unique Accident

While driving home from a fishing trip last week a few of local nimrods met with a unique accident when an over-grown Jackrabbit attacked their car. Some of the boys in the car received small cuts about their faces and hands from flying glass. Outside of this the only other costs of the colission was the Jackrabbit's life and about $2.50 for a windshield glass.

Minneapolis—Additional prohibition agents will be sent to the Minnesota-Ontario border as soon as they are available, Adjutant General W. F. Rhinow, northwest prohibition director, declared as government sale of liquor became effective in the Canadian province.

Crookston—A meeting in the 30-day campaign to stimulate interest in better farming methods was conducted here as a part of a general program extending through the Red River Valley. The campaign is being sponsored by the Red River Valley Improvement association.

Minneapolis—Minneapolis has contributed $10,360 to a fund intended to preserve a record of the achievements of the first Swedish settlers on American soil, according to a report made by C. J. Swanson, chairman of the committee sponsoring the Swedish-American three hundredth anniversary movement.

St. Paul—Rigid mental tests by experts will be given every inmate of a state penal institution before he will be considered for parole, under rules adopted by the state parole board. The rules provide for a tightening up of procedure in granting paroles, aimed at keeping prisoners in confinement for longer periods.

Minneapolis—An old, battered automobil which Captain Charles A. Lindbergh drove when he went to school at Little Falls, Minn., is to be transported across the Atlantic ocean by Minnesota American Legion men and paraded through the boulevards of Paris on a Minnesota float at the Legionnaires' convention in September.

Minneapolis—The Y. W. C. A. building campaign with $1,000,000 as its goal opened at an inaugural dinner at the Nicollet hotel. Eleven hundred members of the campaign army assembled to receive instructions and to listen to speeches from campaign leaders stating the objective of the drive—a new building large enough and equipped to serve 100,000 girls and women of Minneapolis.

Little Falls—An invitation has been extended to President Coolidge to attend the homecoming planned for Charles A. Lindbergh when the famous flier returns to his "home town." The Lindbergh homecoming committee, of which Mayor A. L. Grimes is chairman, urges the President to come here to confer the distinguished flying cross which President Coolidge and Secretary Davis have agreed to award the flier.

Minneapolis—Laboratory testing of Minnesota wheat at the state test mill in Minneapolis will be much curtailed after July, and almost suspended, it was announced by N. J. Holmberg, state commissioner of agriculture. The mill will continue to operate, manufacturing flour at cost for state institutions, but the laboratory activities will be crippled because Governor Theodore Christianson vetoed the appropriation of $6,000 a year for support of the laboratory.

Dawson—J. L. Jacobs, editor of the Dawson Sentinel, owned by Governor Christianson, was burned about the hands and face in an explosion in the plant followed by a fire. Damage to the building and machinery was estimated at $5,000.

Minneapolis—Six members of the legislature, forming the interim committee on bank taxation, met at the Minneapolis Club with a group of Twin City bankers for an informal discussion of the problem handed to the committee by the recent legislature.

Cowboys Shoot Way From Wrecked Car

Miles City, Mont.—A novel use for pistols was discovered by two cowboys of this section when they used their "gats" as an aid to extract themselves from under an overturned car.

Bert A. Mumpower and W. L. Vawter were pinned beneath their auto when the machine skidded off the road.

With no one in sight and little prospect of extracting themselves, Vawter poured a hail of bullets into the door of the car. Under the shower of the shots the door opened and enabled the men to crawl from their perilous positions.

The men escaped with minor injuries.

DOG IS VICTOR IN FIGHT WITH COBRA

Kills Snake and Escapes the Poison Fangs.

Calcutta.—How a terrier killed a cobra and escaped the poison fangs of one of India's most deadly snakes is related by a correspondent in a Calcutta paper.

"While at dinner at Barrackpore," he writes, "a party of nine was disturbed by a terrier barking furiously. Failing to silence him, one of our number went out with a torchlight and shouted that the dog was barking at a huge snake.

"The torch enabled the dog to see the snake; he seized it, dragged it off the veranda rails, and, in a series of rushes, pulled the twisting, writhing horror probably some 20 or 30 yards. We were then able to see by the hood that the snake was a cobra.

"Most of us rushed back to the house for sticks, while the man with the torch and another endeavored to get the dog away from the snake, but keeping at a safe distance.

"By the time we had returned with the sticks, however, the dog had done his work and appeared none the worse. Every moment we expected to see him show signs of distress, but he did not do so, regarding his victim with apparent disdain. The cobra was still alive, but its back was broken. It then only remained for us to beat its brains out with our sticks.

"I may add that one of the party has been living in the country for over 30 years, spending most of his time in the district, and he expressed astonishment that the dog had escaped a fatal bite."

Boy's Fake Fire Alarm Causes Fireman's Death

New York.—A prankish boy turned in a false alarm that caused the death of a fireman when the hose truck on which he was riding struck an elevated pillar at One Hundred Fifty-sixth street and Westchester avenue, the Bronx.

Henry Hositer, forty-five, of 606 East One Hundred Thirty-fifth street, the Bronx, the father of four children, was the man killed. Two others were injured when the driver, Joseph Conroy, swerved the truck to avoid a collision with another truck and struck the pillar.

The police locked up Irwin Blum, ten, of 702 East One Hundred Fifty-sixth street, who is alleged to have admitted he turned in the alarm because he "wanted to see how the box worked."

Neck Broken 3 Years, Farmer Didn't Know It

Hightstown, N. Y.—Three years ago Maurice Croshaw, twenty-one years old, son of Elwood Croshaw, a farmer, was milking when the cow kicked and knocked him off his foot-high stool. His neck was injured, but Croshaw thought it merely a bad wrench. An X-ray picture revealed that one of the vertebrae in the neck was fractured and he was taken to the Anderson hospital in Philadelphia, where it was reported that his condition is not serious.

Several times during the three years Croshaw suffered pains in his neck. Both a physician and an osteopath had treated it without discovering the fracture. Ten days ago Croshaw jarred his neck while working over a tractor and it began to swell.

Boy's Body Located by Rooster's Crowing

Bellingham, Wash.—After dynamite and grappling irons had failed to recover the body of Seigur Anderson from the Fraser river, in British Columbia, an old Scandinavian myth proved the means of finding the stream's victim.

Relatives, who are Norwegians, carried a Rhode Island rooster in their boat and rowed about the spot where the lad drowned. Each time the rooster was carried over a certain spot he crowed lustily. True to legend drag hooks immediately grappled the body.

Roosters thus used in Europe when locating drowned persons, according to superstitious ones, were always successful.

Leaps to Death

Milan, Italy.—A seventy-three-year-old man committeed suicide recently by jumping from the spire of the cathedral. He was killed instantly. He had been in ill health for some time.

They Were Half Affinities

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

MARTHA SCOTT was three or four years older than Dick Mapes, her cousin, had been married three years and felt herself very much Dick's senior in age and experience.

"I know you didn't come just to see me—something is on your mind. Out with it!" she said to him one Saturday afternoon when he called on her.

So Dick told Martha about a girl named Helen—a foolish little girl that he wanted to marry.

"She's got some funny notions," Dick explained apologetically. "I've asked her to marry me and I think she likes me as much as anyone. She made me go to a psycho-analyst to have me tested, and then she made me go have my horoscope cast. She found from that that while we were affinities in some ways we weren't whole affinities. You think, of course, that she's an awful fool, but I'm in love with her and I've made up my mind to marry her—"

Martha told her cousin that she didn't see what she could do about it.

"It's this way," Dick explained. "I want to bring Helen up here and introduce you as Madame Zera or something like that. I want you to pose as a phrenologist or mind reader or something, and I want you to tell Helen that the happiest marriages are those between half affinities."

So it was agreed between Martha and Dick that on the following Saturday he was to bring Helen to her apartment and introduce his cousin as Madame Zera, the world's most famous physiognomist. She must say that she could tell just by looking at the shape of Helen's features anything she wanted to know about her past, present or future. It had been arranged that Martha's maid should open the door and announce them. Dick should remain waiting in the little foyer hall while Helen alone should go into the living room to interview the great Zera.

Martha, with an old Spanish veil over her head and drawn part way over her face, nodded to the girl without rising, and then motioned to her to sit on a low seat before her. There was an unmistakable sneer on Martha's face when she looked at Helen.

"A pretty face with no brains behind it," she observed as Helen took her seat.

Helen blushed and her eyes grew very bright with resentment. Still she let the great Zera pass her slender finger tips over her well-formed features.

"You are inclined to be very rash," said Zera. "You permit yourself to be led by your heart and not your intellect. At present you are somewhat in love with a young man who is in many ways uncongenial. Your intellect tells you not to marry him. But you foolishly are ignoring what your intellect tells you. As a matter of fact, though the young man says he loves you he is only amused by you—"

Helen interrupted with a long "Oh-o," and drew back from the soothsayer, who looked searchingly into the girl's face with curling lips and a contemptuous stare.

"This young man has a number of very bad habits. He is in love with a number of other women at the same time."

"You have no right to say anything like that," protested Helen. "I don't see how you can tell from the shape of my nose what Di—what this young man does or doesn't do."

Madame Zera did not deign to reply to this. "You do not really love this man, anyway. You are incapable of loving anyone unselfishly. You are too fond of having a gay time—like a pretty little butterfly. There is little more I can tell you—only I beg of you to heed my advice. Don't marry this young man. Don't think that just because he is a half affinity he is really congenial."

"I don't want to hear any more," said Helen with trembling voice. "I want to get away from you. How much is it, please—"

"Five dollars," said Zera. "My usual charge is twenty, but since I have found so little in your face I will charge less. But this one piece of advice I have given you is worth five thousand dollars—because if you heed it it will keep you from a life of unhappiness."

Helen rushed out of the room, seized Dick's hand, and rushed out of the apartment with cheeks aflame. "Let's get out of here right away," she whispered. "She's perfectly hateful—she just sat and sneered at me and insulted me."

Dick would have liked to hurry right back to his cousin to ask her why she had bungled the game so badly, but he could think of no excuse. Helen, feeling very forlorn, put her hand on Dick's arm. "She said some perfectly horrid things about you, but I don't believe them. She said—" and the tears were trickling down Helen's cheeks—"she said you didn't really love me."

No one was there in that corner of the hall to see them so Dick put his arms around Helen to comfort her. "And she told me never to marry you," wailed Helen; "but I'm going to anyway—and I'm going to send her an invitation to our wedding just to show her."

"I have an idea if she's asked that she'll come," said Dick, releasing Helen as he heard steps on the stairs

Famous Man Hid Fact of His Lowly Origin

Some curious things have come to light at the festivities of the unveiling of a memorial tablet to Henri de Blowitz, the famous London Times correspondent, Pierre Van Paassen says, in the Atlanta Constitution. The tablet was unveiled in his native village in Czechoslovakia. The schoolmaster of the village has been largely responsible for the whole affair. He showed guests a letter, written in French from Paris, in which De Blowitz seeks admission into the Roman Catholic church and expresses his desire to give a gift to the poor local church. The famous man, whose real name was Opper and who came from Blovice, however, writes in his autobiography that he was a Catholic from infancy. He also starts his book with a reference to the chateau of Blovice, whereas the tablet was affixed to a little house in the square. His father was no lord of the manor, but a Jewish shopkeeper who at the same time acted as caretaker of the local synagogue. The boy, Opper, was inscribed at the village school, as the present master showed, where he won a prize in 1834 for his proficiency in reading the Czech language.

Traded Shirt for Pearl

A white undershirt occupies a higher position in the eyes of natives inhabiting Penrhyn island, which is near Christmas island, far out in the Pacific, than does white man's money, according to Medford R. Kellum, who recently completed a two-year cruise of the South seas. Arriving at Penrhyn island, Kellum offered a native several thousand dollars for a gorgeous "pipi" pearl. The native refused to consider selling his gem for mere paper, but accepted Kellum's white undershirt in trade and regarded his new acquisition as being well worth its cost to him.

New Form of "Waif"

The old story of the abandoned baby on the doorstep was presented with a variation at Glendale, Calif. When C. A. Redmond investigated a mysterious rattling on his front porch he found a thoroughbred Boston terrier tied to his door. Attached on the dog's harness was a shipping tag with the message: "We are leaving the city in haste. Take care of this little thoroughbred until we can claim it again and it will be worth your while."

Shame on Him

A rather prominent member of the business women's section of the Woman's Department club was recently invited to a "shower" for a bride-elect. As she started from home with her gift (a waffle iron) carefully wrapped in a box, she met her next-door neighbor, a young former soldier. She playfully handed him the package and said: "Guess what I'm taking to the party." He felt it and replied: "So you baked a cake, did you?"—Indianapolis News.

FARMER WOMAN IN OKLAHOMA

Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Because It Gave Her Health and Strength

In a sunny pasture in Oklahoma, a herd of sleek cows was grazing. They made a pretty picture. But the thin woman in the blue checked apron sighed as she looked at them. She was tired of cows, tired of her tedious work in the dairy. She was tired of cooking for a houseful of boarders, besides caring for her own family. The burdens of life seemed too heavy for her failing health. She had lost confidence in herself.

One day she began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and her general health began to improve. She took it faithfully. Now she can do her work without any trouble, sleeps well and is no longer blue and timid.

This woman, Mrs. Cora Short, R. R. 9, Box 387, Oklahoma City, Okla., writes: "Everybody now says: 'Mrs. Short, what are you doing to yourself?' I weigh 135 and my weight before I took it was 115. I have taken seven bottles of the Vegetable Compound."

Other women who have to work hard and keep things going may find the road to better health as Mrs. Short did, through the faithful use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

CHAPTER X

—13—

To the outside eye Anne had presented no more dolorous and dejected an aspect than any of the others. No one, not even Bassett, noticed that her demeanor was in any way other than what might have been expected.

Had they been able to see into her mind the group at Gull-island would have received its second staggering shock.

She kept as much to herself as she could without rousing curiosity. She had to think and to be alone where she would focus her thoughts, hold them trained on what she knew and what might develop. She wanted to keep her mind on the main issue, inhibit any fruitless speculations, wait and be ready. Joe was on the island and with the guarded causeway would stay on the island till after they had gone. Her hope, giving her strength to go through the automatic actions of behavior, was, that suspicion not being directed to him, he could lie hidden till they left and then make his getaway. She knew that Gabriel had gone to White Beach for a week's deep-sea fishing, and Gabriel was the one person besides herself who knew that Joe had not crossed to the mainland. They surely would be moved away before a week and if, during that time, the belief that he had gone remained unshaken, he was safe.

So far she was confident that no suspicion had touched him. She did not see how it could. They were all satisfied that he had left, her answer to Rawson had been accepted in good faith. There would be no investigating of his movements for there would be no reason for doing it. He had passed outside the circle of the tragedy, was eliminated as the actors were who had gone on the earlier boat.

If they didn't find him!

Where was he? He had entered the living room by the door that led to the kitchen wing and rear staircase. That would look as if he was in the house. But she knew that no doors were locked on Gull Island and that he might have come from outside, choosing a passage through the darkened building rather than expose himself to the moonlight. If he was in the house he must be in the vacant top story and she was certain—every sound of heavy footsteps had been noted by her listening ears—that the men had not been there yet. That would argue that they felt no need of hurry. What conclusions were they coming to behind the closed doors of the library—had they fixed on some one of the party, the obvious ones, Flora or Stokes?

She checked these disintegrating surmises, drew her mind back with a fierce tug of will. That would come later. If Joe got away she would tell, confess it all, go to jail. It didn't matter, what happened then. Only what was here before her counted now.

When the search of the island started she went up to the side of the gallery that skirted the line of windows. The group of men came into her line of vision, moving across the flat land between the house and the ocean. She sat crouched, watching with set jaw. Presently they dropped over the edges of the cliffs, then inarticulate surges of prayer rose in her, blind pleadings; and, her hands clasped against her breast, she rocked back and forth as if in unassuagable pain. But they always reappeared without him, went down again, came up, scrambling through the stony mouths of ravines—always without him. When they returned to the house, she fell back in the chair, her eyes closed, whispering broken words of thanksgiving.

With her breath and her voice under control she went downstairs. She knew now that he must be in the house.

After lunch she drifted out on the balcony with the others and from there saw Bassett and the two officers of the law go down the path to the pine grove. Following Sybil's movements on the Point—that would take them some time. Mrs. Cornell said she was going to the kitchen to help Miss Pinkney (if it wasn't for that work she thought she'd go crazy), and she advised Anne to go upstairs and lie down.

"You look like the wrath of God, honey," she said, hooking her hand through Anne's arm and drawing her with her. "You can't sleep, no one expects that of you. But stretch out on the bed and relax—you get some sort of rest that way."

Anne went with her, Mrs. Cornell's step dropping to a crawling pace as they crossed the living room, her arm drawing Anne closer, her hearty voice dwindled to a whisper:

"Do you know anything?"

"No, how should I? Do you think they have any one in mind?"

"They have two, dearie, as we all have." They had reached the door and she opened it warily. "And one moment I'm thinking it's one and the next moment I'm thinking it's the other and the third moment I'm thinking it's neither of them."

They passed through the doorway and went down the hall, stopping at the foot of the stairs. Mrs. Cornell offered a last consoling word:

"You can be thankful for one thing, Anne, Joe's not being here."

"Joe?"

"Oh, I'm not saying he had anything to do with it. But these cases—you read about them in the papers. Every little thing traced up. And she and Joe having been at loggerheads they'd be pouncing on that—not telling you anything, sending up your blood pressure with their questions. You're spared that and it's worth keeping your mind on. Nothing so bad but what it might be worse."

She went on down the hall. Anne, on the stairs, waited till she heard the sound of the opening door and Miss Pinkney's welcoming voice, then she stole upward very softly. She did not go to her room as Mrs. Cornell had advised, but tiptoed to the end of the hall where the staircase led to the top story.

"I Thought I Was Never Going to Get a Word With You," He Said.

She ascended with delicate carefulness letting her weight come gradually on each step. Despite her precautions the boards creaked. The sounds seemed portentously loud in the deep quiet and she stopped for the silence to absorb them, and then, with chary foot, went on. At the top she stood, subduing her deep-drawn breaths, looking, listening.

The middle of the floor was occupied by a spacious central hall furnished as a parlor and lit by a skylight. Giving on it were numerous small bedrooms, the doors open. The stirrings of the curtains, billowing out and drooping, were the only movements in the place. She moved to the middle of the room and sent her voice out in a whisper:

"Joe, Joe—are you here? It's Anne."

Her ears were strained for an answering whisper, her eyes swept about for a shape creeping into view, but the silence was unbroken, the emptiness undisturbed. She entered the rooms, peered about, opened cupboards, looked for signs of occupation. Again nothing—vacancy, dust in a film on the bureau tops, beds untouched in meticulous smoothness.

One door was closed, near the stairhead. Opening this she looked into a storeroom, a large, dark interior lit by two small windows. They were dust-grimed, and the light came in dimly, showing upturned trunks and boxes, pieces of furniture, lines of clothes hanging on the walls.

"Here," she thought, and with her heart leaping in her throat, crossed the threshold:

"Joe, it's Anne. I've come to help you."

Nothing stirred in the encumbered space, no stealthy body detached itself from the shadows.

"Oh, answer me if you're there!" Her voice rose the shade of a tone. It came back from the raftered roof in smothered supplication; the silence it had severed closed again, deep and secretive.

She feared to stay longer and slipped, wraithlike, down the stairs. In her room she sat down and considered. He must have been there. Where else could he be unless in one of the unoccupied apartments in the lower floors. But he hardly would have dared that with people coming and going. He had been afraid, doubted her as he had always done, or possibly found a hiding place too shut away for her whisper to penetrate. Tonight she would have to get food to him, take it up when the men were in the library and the others safe in their rooms.

She could do nothing more and went downstairs in the hope of seeing Bassett. Since morning she had longed for a word with him. Not that she had any idea of telling him, the direful secret was hers alone to be confessed later on some awful day of reckoning and retribution. But she wanted to see him, get courage from his presence, feel the solace of his arm about her. She was so lonely with her intolerable burden.

The living room was empty, but listening at the hall door she heard the murmur of men's voices in the library. They were in conference again and might be long. She passed out into the garden and sank down on one of the benches. The breeze moved among the flowers and sent shivers down the great wisteria vine trained up the house wall and ascending to the chimneys. She looked at it, its drooping foliage, stirred by a quivering unrest, showing the fibrous branches intertwined like ropes—an old vine such as city dwellers seldom see.

There were clouds in the sky, hurrying white masses driving inland and carrying the breath of fog. They had blotted out the sun and were sweeping their torn edges over the blue. If they kept on it would be dark tonight—no moon—but there was the man at the causeway.

She sat with drooped head immersed in thought, her hands thrust into the pockets of her sweater. It was thus that Bassett found her. Life leaped into her face at his voice and she stretched a hand toward him.

"Oh, I've been hoping to see you," she breathed, already trained to a low wariness of tone.

The words, the gesture, pierced his heart. She looked so disconsolate, so wan, her face the pallor of ivory, her black hair always shining smooth, pushed back from her brow in roughened strands. He had charged himself to keep from her any knowledge of the interest in Joe, but had he been of the loose-tongued sort that unburdened itself, the sight of her devastated beauty would have sealed his lips.

"I thought I was never going to get a word with you," he said. "This is the first moment I've had. How are you?"

She asserted her well-being, and he studied her face with anxious eyes.

"Dear Anne," he murmured, and lifting her hand, pressed it to his lips. The two hands remained together, the woman's upcurled inside the man's enveloping grasp.

"That faint feeling last night, I suppose that will bleach you out for a while?"

"Oh, I'm all over that. It was a crazy thing for me to do, going down and then knocking the lamp over. They didn't think anything of it, did they?"

"Anything of it? Why no, what would they think? You explained it to them and they were satisfied with what you said. And afterward I told Williams that he could absolutely trust your word."

"I gave a great deal of trouble and—" Her voice was husky and she cleared her throat. After a moment she went on:

"I suppose you can't tell me anything—anything of what they're doing?"

"No. It's all a mess so far—feeling about in the dark—nothing sure."

"But they must be feeling about after some one?"

"Darling, what's the good of talking about it? We don't get many minutes together and we don't want to spoil them. Let's try to forget just while we're here."

"Forget!" she exclaimed. "Nothing would make me do that but being dead myself."

She leaned her head on his shoulder and drew her hand from his to clasp it round his arm. He said nothing for a moment, perturbed by her words and tone. He had thought of getting her away, having her moved to Hayworth. Now he felt he must do it at once, the shadow of the tragedy was too dark on her spirit.

"I've got to get her out of here if I go to jail for it," he said to himself. "She can't stand much more of this."

Might Reasonably Be Called "Fixed Income"

A negro was arrested at the instance of his wife for nonsupport and refusal to work. He was being cross-examined by a young lawyer, who was the law partner of a local politician, called Colonel Benson. During the examination of the negro the young lawyer asked:

"Dick, have you any fixed income?"

The negro was puzzled by the term. Counsel explained that the expression meant a certainty of money paid, not for odd jobs, but for steady employment; in other words, a compensation at stated intervals on which one could absolutely rely.

Upon the conclusion of the counsel's remarks, the negro's face brightened.

"Ah done fink Ah hab a fixed income, sah," he said.

"And what is this fixed income?" was the next question.

"Well, sah," he answered with a broad grin in the direction of Colonel Benson, "de colonel dar allers gibs me fo' dollahs an' a sack ob flour on election days."—Everybody's Magazine.

Geologist's Idea Made Fortunes for Others

The first to introduce the use of coal oil, or "kerosene," in the United States and Canada was Dr. Abraham Gesner, a distinguished Canadian geologist.

Doctor Gesner, after long experimentation, discovered how to produce oil that could be used in lamps for illuminating purposes, from bituminous shale and cannel coal. Though he gave the name "kerosene" to his discovery it was popularly called coal oil.

Following the discovery of petroleum in Pennsylvania in 1859, and later in many other sections of North America, kerosene became the principal product of the distillation of the crude oil. Like most inventors, Doctor Gesner reaped little financial benefit from his discovery, which was destined to be the foundation of scores of immense fortunes.

Fish Killed by Cold

We call fish cold-blooded, but they dislike extreme cold as much as a boy dislikes an [illegible] bath. They actually die of cold; millions of tile-fish across the Atlantic were killed by chilly currents, and fish brought up by Scott's men in the Antarctic, from water with a temperature of 30 degrees, froze to death as they reached the air, where the temperature was 70 degrees colder.

BANKERS HELPING

Three banks in South Carolina have inaugurated a plan to provide free of rent for two years a centrally located place to be used by the farmers of Greenville and neighboring counties for the purpose of establishing a creamery, a canning factory and a farm woman's club. The idea is to get the farmers to raise livestock, to raise their own food and feed and to have something extra to sell. The canning factory is intended to utilize the surplus garden and fruit products, and the club rooms for getting the support and co-operation of the farm women.

Georgia bankers have made great strides in furthering a diversified farming program the past year. They induced farmers to sow fifty-five carloads of vetch seed, furnished local prizes in eighty counties for the corn contest, the state prize of $1,000 being furnished by a bank in Atlanta. A banker-farmer alfalfa demonstration was held at the college and attended by 250 bankers and farmers. Alfalfa acreage has increased from 1,800 to 5,000, the demonstration being credited with 50 per cent of this increase. This year the state has produced 12,000,000 more bushels of corn than last year, has sold 50 cars of truck, $2,000,000 worth of pecans, and has produced 150,000,000 pounds of meat and enough corn and hay for its own use.

AS LABOR SEES BANKS

Vast sums of money are lost each year by wage-earners through investments hastily entered into. With the confidence of the wage-earners, banks will be enabled to more accurately advise such investors and thus save money which might otherwise be lost by unwise speculation. — William Green, President American Federation of Labor.

Vice President Dawes Opens New Lake Michigan Harbor

Vice President Charles G. Dawes.

Vice President Charles G. Dawes last week, following the official vice-presidential salute of 19 guns, raised the flag over Buffington Harbor, Indiana, thus signifying the formal opening to navigation of the first private harbor to be built on Lake Michigan in twenty years, and one of only three such harbors on the Great Lakes. In addition to the vice president, William R. Dawes, president of the Chicago Association of Commerce, E. J. Buffington, president of the Illinois Steel Company, B. F. Affleck, president of the Universal Portland Cement Company, and a number of other notables took part in the ceremonies.

This new deep-water harbor, located at the plant of the Universal company, is said to be one of the most modern on the Great Lakes, there being a large boat-unloading bridge, a million-ton storage yard for raw materials, an electrically operated conveyor nearly a mile long to carry material from dock to cement plant, and an all-concrete lighthouse with one of the brightest beacons on Lake Michigan.

The new improvement adds impetus to the deep-waterway movement and the further enlargement of lake traffic, and enables the cement company to receive by boat and store large quantities of raw materials and to ship cement by water as well as by rail to all points on the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley.

The freighter, "Eugene J. Buffington," discharging a 12,000-ton cargo, was one of the features at the formal opening of Buffington Harbor, the first private harbor to be built on Lake Michigan in twenty years and one of only three private harbors on the Great Lakes.

Marshall County Fair Will Eclipse All Before

With a greater assortment of free attractions, and a better program of exhibits arranged for, plans for the 21st annual Marshall County fair to be held at Warren on July 4, 5, and 6, are rapidly being formed.

The 1927 Marshall County fair will eclipse any exposition that has ever been held in Marshall county and Northwestern Minnesota and nothing has been left undone to make it worthwhile for every citizen of the county to attend, said Wm. Foresberg, president of the association.

The Blackstone & Holman Flying circus will headline the free attractions at this year's exposition. This will be suplemented with acrobatic stunts, band music, hose and auto races and a gorgeous display of fireworks, thus making it far superior to any fair ever arranged for in Marshall county.

Local Ball Team Defeated Again

The local base ball team motored to Gatzke on Sunday where the crossed bats with the Rollis aggregation in a return game. Everything went fine up to the sixth inning when hard luck began to tag the local players at every point. But why worry? Some of the boys who were big hearted enough to help the boys out on Sunday have not played ball for about four years, and the game was not so bad at that.

So taking it all in from different angles and considering the small amount of practice the local boys have had this year they did not do so bad on Sunday. The score was 14 to 6 in favor of the Rollis team. Lawrence Haglund who used to adorn the mound for the local team did not play Sunday.

Queer Pranks Are Played by Tornado

Plucks Hens Clean, Sweeps Granary Away, but Leaves Grain.

Wichita, Kan.—Freakish pranks of the tornado which recently struck south central Kansas reveal nature in her most capricious mood. Despite the destructive results, the workings of the wind are in many instances mirth-provoking.

All his chickens were plucked clean of feathers by the wind, reported A. B. Bonham, a farmer living northeast of Hutchison. He suffered two fractured ribs. Vern Curtis, a poultryman, lost 1,600 small chickens when their coop was destroyed.

Despite the storm, Hutchison business men went on their annual booster trip as scheduled and on the train they subscribed $2,000 for relief of sufferers. Miss Lynette Mathews, Red Cross worker, tripped over a wire and sprained her ankle while directing relief.

Cottonwood trees and orchards were greatly damaged, as well as gardens.

Takes Granary, Leaves Grain.

Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Toews, living near Inman, took refuge from the storm in a granary. The granary was carried away, but the grain was left. Toew's body was found on a pile of grain by his wife, who, dangerously injured, went a quarter of a mile for aid.

Buford Johnson, negro clergyman of Hutchinson, and his son, were killed. Mrs. Johnson had left the home to care for some sick persons in another part of the city, escaping the wrath of the storm.

Mrs. F. H. Templin of Wichita was visiting her parents in Comanches county. They watched the gathering of the storm, little realizing that it was a devastating tornado.

"Along the lower edge of the cloud were smokelike streamers," she related. "These kept lashing back and forth in the air like the tail of a cat. The cloud grew larger and blacker until it took on the appearance of a fierce rain cloud. We could hear the roar of the wind, but did not realize that it was a tornado. We thought it was an ordinary spring storm. Some time after it had passed neighbors came to our house for help and that was the first we knew of the tornado."

This spring a large house was built on the ranch of Mrs. Templin's parents. Some of her relatives went to Medicine Lodge to buy furniture for it, leaving the town just before it was gripped by the wind. Returning home, they found both of the homes—the old and the new—in ruins.

Thresher Adorns Trees.

Wreckage was strewn about the big ranch. Four trucks were missing, although the tires were left on the ground. All excepting two front wheels of a tractor was blown away. A harvester-thresher was carried a quarter of a mile to the timber and pieces of it wrapped around trees. Bark was stripped from some of the trees. The piano was lifted from the house. Its wires were twined around trees.

Furniture was smashed to bits, farming implements were carried away, live stock was slaughtered. One of the women dropped a diamond ring, other jewelry and some money on a dresser in her room as she fled to safety in the cave. After the storm she hurried back and found the valuables in a heap on the ground; although the dresser could not be found.

Roy Platt, manager of the ranch, inspected the damage after the storm, and while viewing dead stock was surprised to find a sow nursing a litter. None of the pigs was injured. A setting hen in a coop was unruffled. The next morning she was setting on her eggs. Her coop and all the other hens had been blown away.

BLEAK PACIFIC ISLE MAY SOLVE ORIGIN OF INDIANS

Primitive People on Nunivak May Be Connecting Link With Ancient Mongolians.

Anchorage, Alaska.—Far out in Bering sea lies Nunivak island. On this bleak bit of land, 70 miles long by perhaps 50 wide, lives a tribe or tribes of people who may be the link connecting the American Indians with the people of ancient Mongolia.

Washed on all sides by treacherous shoals and beaten continually by roaring, pitching surf, ships have always given Nunivak island a wide berth. Only once a year the government cutters or the Boxer of the United States bureau of education dare send a boat ashore.

The landing parties always came back with tales of the most primitive peoples in Alaska. The natives are divergent from the mainland tribes and they also retain many of the ancient customs of the original native.

If they came directly from Siberia or Mongolia there will be something on the island to connect them with the Asiatic land. Noted scientists, Henry B. Collier and T. Dale Stewart, both of Washington, D. C., are aboard the Boxer en route to Nunivak. They will try to discover how long man has inhabited the island. To do this they intend to dig deep into the old soil, turn out the sepulchers, and unearth utensils, weapons, and relics to add to museum collections.

The scientists will make measurements of the native physique, records of their language and observations of tribal customs and art. The Nunivak tribes have lived on the island for hundreds of years, with comparatively little contact with white man's civilization. It is expected they will possess furs, curios, ivory, and perhaps gold to barter for trade goods.

With music and magic tricks the scientists hope to win their confidence and procure aid in the search from now until late September of ethnological data. A study of the fauna and flora of the island will be made by the scientists.

Honk, Honk for Book About "Honk Konk"

Chicago.—What the poor railway correspondence department thinks about has long been a hidden mystery and what the correspondence clerk of the Canadian Pacific railway in Chicago thought about this letter received a few days ago may well be imagined. Apparently the news from Shanghai and other Chinese cities did not disturb the writer who penned the following:

"Dear Sires:

"I have send for a book about Honk Konk and I did not get it. Please send me one book about Honk Konk."

Bargain in Train Fares Hits Even Baby Buggies

Glasgow, Scotland.—Merry-go-rounds and even the donkeys in the children's playgrounds have been hard hit by the bargain-rate fare of the Glasgow tramways, which give a two-hour ride for a fraction less than 4 cents.

Baby carriage manufacturers, too, have been affected by the cheap rate tickets. Their business has fallen off because mothers have found it convenient to allow the nurse to take baby for a street-car ride instead of pushing the youngster about the park. This innovation also has had a tendency to make the nurses more content with their tasks and saves shoe leather besides.

Since the twenty-one mile ride for two coppers was inaugurated last July more than 60,000,00 passengers have made use of it—an increase of 13,000,000 over the previous year—and given the corporation an additional revenue of £55,000.

Automobile and motor cycle dealers who specialized in little family cars designed for the average working man say their business has suffered more than the baby carriage trade, because a car ride now is cheaper than buying gasoline.

Bestow Garlands on Virtuous Poor Girls

Paris.—The best girls of France are being crowned with wreaths of rosebuds and awarded money prizes.

Usually this presentation is the big event of a Sunday ceremony organized for the distribution of various local prizes. Some are for long service, others for special achievement of many kinds.

The prize for virtue dates back to the year 525. St. Medard, bishop of Noyon, is by tradition given credit for initiating a public fund out of his own property to supply the prize money.

The custom spread through the centuries, and it is observed still, mostly in northern France.

Generally the prize is awarded to a poor girl who supports a family.

Princess Ileana Starts Fad for Chewing Gum

Bucharest, Rumania.—Prince Nicholas and Princess Ileana have introduced chewing gum into Rumanian society.

The habit of chewing gum was almost unknown in Bucharest until they returned home from their tour of the United States. Shortly afterward they visited a kiosk which carries foreign newspapers and other knickknacks demanded by tourists and visiting business men and bought a whole box of gum. Since then the dealer says his sales of chewing gum among the natives have increased many fold.

12,000 Indians Live by Fishing Activities

Minneapolis, Minn.—Fishing, primitive industry of the American Indian, still constitutes a principal means of livelihood for the 12,000 aborigines of Minnesota.

Almost every month in the year finds them along the creeks, employing members of their families, headed by the squaw, to raise and lower the nets and to seine under state supervision for rough fish.

One of the biggest fishing projects in the state is a packing plant supplied entirely by the red man. It is on Red lake in northern Minnesota and it packs annually thousands of choice fish caught by the Indians and shipped to all parts of the country.

CLAIMS BLOOD OF NOW EXTINCT RACE

Believed Only Survivor of Nah-Dah-Ko Tribe.

Anadarko, Okla.—Blood of an extinct race flows in the veins of Harry Shirley, believed to be the last of the Nah-Dah-Ko Indians, who attained a degree of civilization as long as four centuries ago.

His father, Pat Shirley, was a white trader, but his mother was a Nah-Dah-Ko. With his white wife and two children, Shirley lives on a farm near Anadarko. He is fifty-five years old.

Virtual annihilation of the Nah-Dah-Kos was completed when Shirley was four years old, and his knowledge of the fate of his people is vague. The band, which was a branch of the Caddo tribe, was not great in numbers, and he believes it was annihilated in an internecine war when he was a child. He was taken to Texas by his father when hostilities broke out, and did not return until the war ended.

The town of Anadarko is named for the vanished tribe. Legend has it that the elder Shirley's Irish pronunciation of the tribal name was responsible for the corruption of the name from Nah-Dah-Ko to Anadarko. Although the present town was not founded until 1901, an Indian agency of the same name was located near here as early as 1858.

The original home of the Nah-Dah-Ko band was in Louisiana. Records of a Spanish explorer reveal that in 1542 the Indians lived in houses, farmed extensively and owned cattle. They were driven westward by the encroachment of the white man and gradually lost their identity through absorption into other tribes and losses in warfare.

New Diamond Fields Attract Farm Labor

Pretoria, Transvaal.—More than 60,000 Europeans and 120,000 natives are working on the newly discovered diamond fields in the Lichtenburg area, according to Dr. H. A. Lorentz, Dutch counsul general here.

The lure of lucky strikes is responsible for a great dearth of farm labor, and Lichtenburg farmers are bewailing the fact that kaffirs cannot be induced to do farm work when they can earn 30 shillings a week in the diamond fields.

No less than 43 per cent of the diggers belong to the agricultural classes, and only nine per cent are diamond miners by trade.

Curious tales of fortune hunting abound. Some who believed they had the richest claims suffered disappointment, while, on the other hand, an old man who sat down when he saw he was being beaten in the race for claim pegging, dug where he sat and struck a rich patch.

In another case a digger cursed when he sprained his ankle, falling over a tuft of grass, but later discovered that he had fallen on a claim that is now panning out rich.

Find 100-Foot Worms Off California Coast

Berkeley, Calif.—Species of sea worms classified as "amazing creatures," some of which are said to be 100 feet long, have been seen, and studied in the Pacific ocean near San Diego by Prof. W. R. Coe, Yale university, as guest research worker at the University of California, Scripps Institution of Oceanography, at La Jolla, he reports.

These remarkable sea denizens, known by the scientific name "nemerteans," have been examined by few biologists of the world. Doctor Coe is believed to be the only living scientist knowing much about them.

To zoologists the worms are especially notable for their length, some of the more common species extending a yard, their bodies being only a fraction of an inch in width. Certain of the nemertean species are reported to be longer than any known animal, 100 or more feet. Even the whale has not been found to reach quite that length, says Doctor Coe.

Soot From Smudge Pots Colors Grave Monuments

Toppenish, Wash.—Sextons are busy with sponge and chamois cleaning grave monuments after the sootfall from the smudge pots burned in central Washington to fight off frost. Polished granite has an affinity for heavy soot and most of the tombstones in cemeteries resembled charred tree trunks in fire-swept forests. The heavy smoke and soot did much temporary damage, but through it all the fruit and prosperity were both saved to the apple growers.

Honey Burden Weighs Down Roof of House

Comshall, England. — There's so much honey in the roof of a Fifteenth-century farmhouse here, called "Cole Kitchen farm," that the ceiling of the room immediately underneath is giving way beneath the weight after 100 years' service as a gigantic beehive.

T. H. English, the owner, says nobody ever tried to get the honey because it would necessitate removing the roof.

In the swarming season the place is smothered with bees.

DAGGER IS FOUND IN UR 5,000 YEARS OLD

Hilt Made of Lapis Lazuli With Studs of Gold.

London.—A wonderful five thousand-year-old golden dagger was one of the many treasures of Ur described by Prof. Leonard Woolley, head of the British Museum section of the Anglo-American expedition which has been excavating the neighborhood of the birthplace of the patriarch Abraham. The flight of time is vividly depicted by Woolley in his latest report to the British museum when he emphasizes that many of the expedition's finds date from a period "more remote in time from Nebuchadnezzar than Nebuchadnezzar is from us, and 2,000 years or more older than the treasures of Tut-Ankh-Amen with which they challenge comparison."

The excavation work has just been closed for the "season," partly owing to lack of funds, but Woolley and his fellow-scientists strongly favor more extensive examination of the ruins for, as he says, "The further we go back the more elaborate and the more finished seems to be the art of Sumeria." At the end of the expedition's fifth season archeologists and historians are now able to picture in detail the civilization of Mesopotamia in 3500 B. C., and "what is truly surprising is the wealth and the high level of the culture of that remote time."

As regards the dagger referred to, Woolley declares the hilt is made of one piece of deep blue lapis lazuli decorated with studs of gold; the blade is of gold, sharp and bright; the sheath, also of gold, is plain at the back, but in front covered with an exquisite design in filigree. With this was found a golden reticule also decorated with filigree, containing a tiny toilet set, tweezers, stiletto and spoon, all in gold. They were at least five thousand five hundred years old.

Seals of Kings.

Excavating the ancient cemeteries during recent weeks the expedition found cylinder seals of no fewer than five early kings, of whom three were unknown to history. It was when the excavators got below the two thousand-year-old graves that they made the best discoveries, for below these they found three thousand two hundred-year-old relics and, still lower, graves going back to 3,500 years before Christ.

The earliest graves were the richest, though naturally not all the treasures they once contained had survived the passage of time. There were no rock-cut chambers, hermetically sealed, such as preserved the woodwork and even the linen fabrics in Tut-Ankh-Amen's tomb. In a land formed entirely of river silt, the ancients but dug a hole, laid at the bottom of it a square of matting, placed on this the body, draped likewise in a mat, with round it such offerings as they could afford, spread another mat over all and then filled up the pit again.

"Naturally after 5,500 years," says Woolley, "much has perished. Wood may have left a film of brown color in the soil, black tinder may represent the tasselated garments or the shroud of the dead, but that is all. Silver is generally reduced to powder, copper may survive, or may become green dust or splinters, the very bones of the man himself may have vanished; only gold remains untouched by time."

But although much has gone a vast deal was yet found to throw light on the earliest period of Mesopotamian history. During the last month of the expedition's work not a day passed that did not produce at least one gold object; vessels of pottery and stone; copper tools and weapons, beads and amulets turned up daily in bewildering numbers and every now and then there was a special prize in the shape of some unique monument of art.

A Gaming Board.

One such remarkable treasure was a gaming board. The actual wooden board had long since decayed, but the incrustation which had covered it remained in position in the earth. It was a difficult and lengthy task to lift without disturbing them the hundreds of tiny bits of inlay that composed it, but this was done at last and now it needs only to reback and clean the mosaic to possess again, just as it originally was, this royal "chess board."

The edging of the board is of mother-of-pearl, the border of mother-of-pearl, ivory and lapis lazuli. The squares, divided by strips of blue lapis and red paste, are of shell engraved and inlaid with red and blue in geometrical designs. Woolley says it is indeed a triumph of ancient craftsmanship.

Incomes in U. S. Increased Billion Dollars in 1926

New York.—Total income in the United States among its 110,000,000 inhabitants was $78,649,000,000 for 1926, compared to $77,313,000,000 for the preceding year, the National Industrial conference board reports.

If the value of all goods and services produced in the country last year had been evenly divided, every man, woman and child would have received $671.43, the report says.

Pays Tribute

Andorra.—This tiny Pyrenean republic of 5,200 inhabitants has just paid its annual tribute of 1,400 francs (about $56) to its two "co-princes," the President of France and the Roman Catholic bishop of Urgel, Spain. For 649 years Andorra has paid tribute and enjoyed undisturbed sovereignty.

ENGLAND'S STORY REVEALED IN INNS

Faded Signs Tell Past of Many Villages.

Birmingham, England.—English villages in agricultural sections are often more than 1,000 years old, and bits of their history are often written in quaint signs which have survived for many centuries.

Next to the church, the inns and smithies are usually the oldest buildings in the villages which have not been engulfed by industries. Before the days of railways and motors the smithy was the center to which everyone had to go both in peace and in war.

Inn signs are particularly useful in tracing the history of villages, as they often show the seals or insignia of lords under whose protection the village thrived in past ages, and frequently indicate the past character of the neighborhood.

But the purely fanciful signs are even more interesting than those which have historical background. One sign, which used to be very common on old English inns, was the "Five Alls." The sign represents the king, "who governs all"; the bishop, "who prays for all"; the lawyer, "who pleads for all"; the soldier, "who fights for all"; and the laborer, "who works for all."

Although many individuals in direct line of descent link the present villagers with their ancestors before the Norman conquest, the villagers of today often know little about the history of their communities, and search of village records often yields little information about the early struggles of the tiny communities which are made up of low brown cottages screened by trees and vines.

Says He Has Found Lost City of Ophir

London.—After a search lasting 20 years, a British naval officer, Commander C. Crauford, declares he has discovered the lost lands of Ophir, whence the queen of Sheba brought to Solomon her magnificent gift of 33 tons of incense, spices, gold, jewels, apes, peacocks, pearls and other valuables. Lecturing to the United Services institute recently, Commander Crauford said he found the city of Ophir exactly where it ought to be—in Arabia, about 400 miles east of Aden.

The city, with its ruined temple of God, is now little more than ruins, which have been visited by many seamen and political agents, he said, but they have never identified it. The commander suggested that excavations on the site would be richly repaid, and said that the land, which was minerally wealthy, should be developed.

"The city is ideally situated," he said. "It has a harbor to the north and has a river which gives wharf space for a seaport. But a thin ribbon of coral sand is drawn across the harbor mouth. It is this strip of sand that strangled the life of Ophir. There is great wealth in Ophir still.

"Palestine now is the Palestine of King Saul. It lies in our power to develop the land to the prosperity of Solomon. There are gold mines and precious stones in the ground, a veritable Transvaal there."

French Alchemist Again Reports Making Gold

Paris.—France's modern alchemist, Jollivet Castelot of Douai, again is sure he is hot on the trail of the famed but unfound philosopher's stone with which the ancients believed base metals could be transmuted into gold.

This alchemist asserts his process of producing gold synthetically now is commercially profitable.

Out of six grams of silver, two of sulphur of antimony, one of orpiment and one of tin, he affirms, he has produced ten milligrams of gold.

He melts the metals, he says, heating them to 1,100 degrees Centigrade, and a complicated process ends in precipitating the gold.

The addition of tin, he says, has improved his earlier process. He claims that besides the gold, almost all the original quantity of silver is recoverable.

Twin Runaways

New York.—The Rosenberger twins of Brooklyn, aged five, have run away from home 11 times now. Each time a policeman has found them, their faces as like as their sailor suits, asleep.

Briton Makes Bungalow of Air Liner Cabin

London.—Everyone knows that most English houses of any antiquity at all generally boast a small collection of spooks, but it is believed that no house on these islands is quite as "shady" as the summer home of Capt. G. H. Leverton, in Wallington, Surrey.

Through it roam the shades of 10,000 travelers who have flown over the city of London in the Vimy-Rolls Royce air liner of the Imperial Airways. After the big plane had outlived its usefulness flying from London to Paris, Captain Leverton bought it and turned the roomy cabin into a bungalow.

Russia Building Churches

In spite of the campaign by the Soviet government to suppress religion, an increase of religious sentiment has been observed with the building of many new Russian churches, says the Pathfinder Magazine. Such churches are generally built by common contributions from factory workers and others. Soviet newspapers upbraided the various clubs and societies in interest for allowing the religious spirit to dominate the people.

—14—

She too was silent for a space, stilled by the attack of a sudden temptation. She wanted to be close to him again, break down the barriers and extend her arms to him for succor and support. The desire to tell him gripped her, undermined her will like a disintegrating drug. She did not dare to broach it suddenly, sense enough remained in her to go carefully, step by step.

"I wonder if any one here does know something and is keeping it back."

"It may be—too frightened to speak." He gave her an uneasy side glance. "Are you imagining that you know something you ought to tell?"

"No, oh no. But I keep thinking of it, all kinds of possibilities. Now, you, if you had suspicions of some one?"

He looked at the grass at his feet in harassed survey of his obligation:

"I'm the only person here they know anything about, that they care to trust. It's a devilish position, trying to hide what you think, trying to state only what you know, fairly, without personal feeling or prejudice. But it's up to me to do it till we round up something. I don't want to get anybody in wrong, but, good lord, if I knew any one was—didn't guess, was sure of it—I'd give the information up just as quick as I could get across to that library."

Her hope was over and she saw now how wild it had been. With a heart like stone she sat by him, feeling the contact of his body, his arm pressed against her side, knowing herself as far removed from his comfort and help as though an ocean lay between them.

Suddenly the doorway of the living room sprang into the dimness, an illumined square, and Mrs. Pinkney was visible moving about lighting the lamps.

"No moon tonight," said Bassett, and getting up, drew her to her feet. "Come, let's go in. It's too chilly for you out here."

It was not till they had gathered round the supper table that Rawson's absence was revealed. Miss Pinkney, coming in with the teapot, saw the empty chair and frowned.

"Is Mr. Rawson coming to his supper?" she remarked with an acid note.

"Mr. Rawson's away on business," Williams answered. "You can keep something for him."

No more was said and the meal proceeded on its dismal way.

After supper Bassett and Williams retired to the library. They were surprised and intrigued by the length of Rawson's absence. Williams wondered if he could have come on anything about Joe Tracy; but Bassett shook the suggestion off with a shrug. He could check up on Joe in half an hour; besides, there was nothing to be looked for in that line. His confidence was not assumed, his mind was untroubled by any fears about Joe. That something had turned up which might head the chase in a new direction was so encouraging a thought, that, by contrast to his sensations for the last twenty-four hours, he felt almost cheerful.

In the relaxation of the strain he was conscious of fatigue for the first time. He threw himself on the sofa and in a moment had sunk into the deep deathlike sleep of exhaustion. Williams, sitting near the telephone also nodded, his big body sagged together in the chair, his chin embedded in his chest.

The group in the living room, viewed by the uninformed spectator, might have been the usual evening gathering of an informal Gull Island house party. They made a deceptively quiet picture, pleasant, agreeable looking people resting in reposeful attitudes after a day in the open air. Stokes was the sole member of the company whose inner unrest broke out in movement. He paced back and forth before the fireplace, quick long strides over the bear rug to the hall door and back again. Once or twice the edge of the rug caught his toe and he kicked it out of his way with a violent angry jerk of his foot.

When the minutes ticked away and no one came to overlook or overhear, a cautious trickle of talk began to flow. Question and answer crossed, low-toned, interrupted by warning looks at the hall door. Where had Rawson gone, what could he be after? That the question lay uppermost in all their minds was shown by the quick response to the first, murmured tentative, the comprehension of sentences left unfinished with only the query in the eyes to point their meaning.

Rawson must have got hold of some information, gone afield on a new clue. Then followed speculations, surmises, suggestions—wild, fantastic, probable. It might have been nothing Shine thought, simply a trip to the county seat on business connected with the case. At this Anne crept into the circle of lamplight, nodding an avid agreement. Stokes coming forward caught his foot in the edge of the bear rug, stumbled and broke into a stream of curses. Miss Pinkney, who thought oaths anywhere reprehensible and on Gull Island profanation, grimly bade him lift his feet. He glared at her, more curses imminent, and Flora groaned, clutching the arms of her chair and rolling her eyes upward.

"For God's sake don't mind anything anybody says," implored Mrs. Cornell. "This is a murder case, not a social function."

They calmed down and presently, with no more ideas to exchange, grew silent, listening for the returning launch. The significance of what they awaited grew with the minutes till the coming of the launch seemed an event of fearful import upon which their fates hung.

The entrance of Williams shook them from their terrors. If his face told them nothing, his manner was kindly gruff—they must be tired, best thing for them to go to bed. As they rose and trailed limply to the doors he beckoned Shine to remain. He would want him later, had a job for him, so he'd better go now and get some sleep.

Williams went back to the library, where Bassett still slept. He looked at his watch—a quarter to nine. He couldn't understand it—what could Rawson have got hold of on the mainland when it was as plain as printing Mrs. Stokes was the guilty party. He started and moved to the window; the throbbing beat of an engine came through the silence, a low spark of light was advancing from the opposite shore.

When he heard the boat grinding against the wharf he waked Bassett.

"Rawson's coming. And it's nearly nine."

Rawson came in by the window, his eyes blinking in the room's brightness. He tried to look stern but satisfaction shone in his eyes and lit his long lantern-jawed face. He was like the bearer of good tidings who would have worn the high smile of triumph if a smile were fitting.

"Well," said Williams, "where the devil have you been?"

"Down the coast, twenty-five miles, on roads that would have put anything but a flivver out of commission."

"You got something?"

"I did—this time. We're on the right track now if I'm not much mistaken."

Williams gave an incredulous grunt. He did not believe in new material and in advance placed himself in stubborn opposition:

"What did you go down the coast for?"

"To find a man called Gabriel Harvey."

Bassett, about to sit down, stopped in surprise:

"Gabriel Harvey? That's our launchman."

"Exactly. And I had a devil of a time to find him. Down in a place called White Beach, hidden away with friends in a shack without a telephone."

"But why—"

"I'll tell you. I went over there to look into Joe Tracy's movements. I couldn't find anyone who'd seen him come ashore and learned that the man Gabriel who took him over, had gone to this place White Beach for deep-sea fishing. Not being able to get hold of him I went to the station to see if I could gather up anything. And I did. The baggage man told me Gabriel had been there before he left for White Beach leaving a suitcase and fishing rod to be held till Tracy called for them. They're there now. I saw them."

Williams said nothing, not ready with argument till more was divulged. Bassett, in blank amazement, ejaculated:

"Why, that's the most extraordinary thing—"

"Wait, Mr. Bassett," Rawson raised a long commanding hand. "I hung round till the evening train came in; that's the train Tracy was to take. I saw the conductor—it's a small branch road and travel is light at that hour—and he remembered his passengers, two women and a child. Those were the only people who left Hayworth on the seven-fifteen, the last evening train. I went back to the village and made inquiries. Tracy had hired no vehicle at the garage or livery stable, nor had he been seen anywhere about the place. Then I got a car and went to White Beach. I was some time locating the old chap, but I finally ran him down. He said he had not taken Tracy across to the mainland last night."

Rawson dropped back in his chair. In answer to Bassett's expression he nodded soberly:

"Yes, it's a pretty queer business. Gabriel said he'd told the boy to be on time; made it clear to him that he wouldn't wait. When Tracy was not on the wharf he went to the house to look for him, saw his bag and fishing-rod in the doorway and took them. No one was about and he left—not sorry, I inferred from what he said, to give 'the young cub,' as he called him, a lesson."

Bassett got up:

"But it's incomprehensible," he exclaimed. "I can't make head nor tail of it. No one ever questioned that he'd gone."

"No one said they'd seen him go but his sister," came from Williams.

Bassett wheeled on him:

"Yes, you asked her. Didn't she say she'd seen him?"

"No." Rawson's voice was dryly quiet. "I've thought of that. What she said was that he went. In all fairness to her she probably thought so—took it for granted, as you all did—that he'd gone."

"But why? What's the meaning of it? If he'd missed the boat he'd have turned up, he'd be here now."

"Oh, he didn't miss the boat," said Rawson.

"Well, then, what was he doing? What made him stay?" In the turmoil of his amazement, this sudden precipitation of a new mystery, Bassett had not yet grasped the sinister trend of the other's thoughts.

"Why," said Rawson slowly, "he might have been staying for a purpose."

"What purpose?"

"Can't you imagine a purpose, Mr Bassett?"

"Good God, you don't mean to say you think he did it?"

"I'm not saying anything yet. But I'd like you to tell me how you explain it. He says he's going, leads every one to think he's going, makes all the preparations for his departure, then secretly, without divulging any change of plans, doesn't go. Aren't those actions—well to put it mildly—questionable? And note this. He had cause for anger against Miss Saunders—she'd given him away to you—and you yourself have told us that he had an ungovernable temper."

"He had a devilish temper and a d—d mean disposition and I make no doubt he was blazing mad with her. But that he'd go to work to kill her in cold blood, lay in wait for her—no—you can't make me think that."

"Same here," said Williams. "You ain't got enough provocation. With Mrs. Stokes you have—a woman jealous of her husband."

"And you've got a man," retorted Rawson, "moved by one of the passions that lead oftenest to murder—revenge."

"Revenge?" echoed Williams.

"Miss Saunders' accusation, if true—and I think it was—would ruin him in his profession. He learned what she'd done to him just before he was due to leave."

A chill passed through Bassett—revenge was a word that fitted Joe. But he cast the thought out, moving away from the desk and exclaiming with angry repudiation:

"Oh, it's unthinkable, preposterous."

"What but an evil intention could have made him act as he did?"

"Any number of things. It may be a prank—a practical joke we'll get an explanation of later. He may have invented the story of his fishing trip and gone off with a girl."

"Had he a girl?"

"I don't know—also he may have done something dishonest, got in wrong some way—he was capable of it, I'm not defending him—and been frightened and lit out."

Great Russian Had Hair-Trigger Temper

Turgenev found himself involved in futile arguments with his young friend, which only ended in sullen tiffs. Thus we hear Tolstoy shouting with a flash of his maddening steel-gray eyes "I stand in the doorway with a dagger and a saber and I say, 'As long as I live, no one shall enter here.' That I call conviction. And you—you're trying to hide your real thoughts from each other and you call that conviction."

Turgenev, in the thin falsetto of rage, gasps irreleventiy: "Why do you come here? This isn't where you belong. Go to Princess So-and-So."

"I don't have to ask you where to go, do I? Anyway, idle talk won't turn into conviction because of my coming."

"Darling Tolstoy," says a friendly witness, trying to make peace, "do calm yourself. You know how he esteems and loves you."

But Tolstoy, with dilating nostrils only growls:

"I won't stand for it! He does it to tease me. It's on purpose that he's pacing up and down and wagging his democratic haunches."—From Yarinolusky's "Turgenev."

THIS WOMAN FOUND RELIEF

After Long Suffering by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

In a little town of the middle West, was a discouraged woman. For four months she had been in such poor health that she could not stoop to put on her own shoes. Unable to do her work, unable to go out of doors or enjoy a friendly chat with her neighbors, life seemed dark indeed to Mrs. Daugherty. Then one day, a booklet was left at her front door. Idly she turned the pages. Soon she was reading with quickened interest. The little booklet was filled with letters from women in conditions similar to hers who had found better health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I began taking the Vegetable Compound," Mrs. Daugherty writes, "and after I took the third bottle, I found relief. I am on my eleventh bottle and I don't have that trouble any more, and feel like a different woman. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to everyone I see who has trouble like mine, and you can use these facts as a testimonial. I am willing to answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—MRS. ED. DAUGHERTY, 1308 Orchard Ave., Muscatine, Iowa.

NO FORM of government is preordained to permanence. The whole history of government denies it. The American hope is simply that ours may live without interruption by clinging as long as possible to the formula of our fathers and, when that program can no longer be reconciled to changing times, to adapt it to new conditions and new experience. This was the intention of the founders who intimated clearly in their construction that they considered it neither sacrosanct nor incapable of new development.

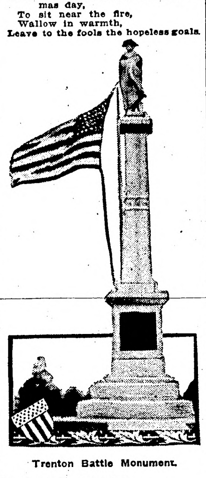
CHRISTMAS DAY AT TRENTON, YEAR 1776

When the Light of Freedom Was Rekindled.

Footprints in the snow. . .
The road is slow.
They plunge and stumble; sharp flakes blind.
Crust bites knees. Bare feet freeze,
Tear on ice. . . . And still they go
Over the road on Christmas day,
The road to Trenton Christmas day,
The dark road to Trenton,
The deep road to Trenton,
White before—and red behind.

Footprints in the snow. . . .
Hopes are low
For those who dare dream to be free.
In New York town, the oath to the crown
Is the popular thing. Hear the word go:
"There's no more war this Christmas day."
"The king has mercy Christmas day."
"We're loyal subjects. . . ."
"We were misled. . . ."
"We will prosper. Let us be."

Footprints in the snow. . . .
Weeks ago,
All have left but stubborn souls.
When defeats, brought retreats,
The sane went home. Sane men know
It's good to be home on Christmas day,
With the wife and children Christmas day,
To sit near the fire,
Wallow in warmth,
Leave to the fools the hopeless goals.



Trenton Battle Monument.

Footprints in the snow. . . .
Hear them blow
The roof off the barracks with a song
Mug on mug. Jug on jug,
Vanish in laughter. "We'll all go Back to Hesse after Christmas day."
In the warm town of Trenton Christmas day,
The sleek town of Trenton,
The roaring town of Trenton,
They say the word: "It won't be long."

Footprints in the snow. . . .
Wind gusts blow
The rags aside, and stab and freeze.
Farmhands with gaunt, flaming eyes
Drag to the battle, just to show
That stubborn men on Christmas day
Are as stubborn as on other days.
Mules have a right
To die like gentlemen.
Men lie frozen near the trees.

Footprints in the snow. . .
Bugles blow.
They crouch and charge, raggedly lined.
Muskets bark. Cannon spark
To flame and thunder . . . Years ago
A party was spoiled on Christmas day,
A cause rekindled Christmas day
On the road to Trenton,
Gay, sleek Trenton,
White before—and red behind.
—Henry W. Harris, in the Boston Globe.

Pennsylvania's Honor

On the vote regarding the acceptance or ratification of the Declaration of Independence six colonies had recorded their votes in the affirmative and six in the negative. John Morton cast his vote for Pennsylvania, in favor of the measure, thereby securing the majority of colonies and the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. Thus it is that the vote of Pennsylvania became the keystone of the Arch of Liberty.

Valley Forge

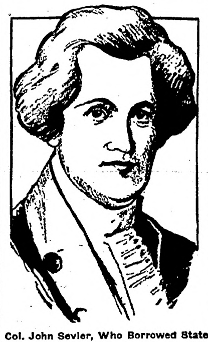
In 1742 a small iron works called the Mount Joy Forge was built on a little creek which flows into the Schuylkill river about nineteen miles northwest of Philadelphia. This iron foundry was also known as the valley forge. Hence the name of the creek and the camp. The place is famous in American history because Washington and his army wintered there in 1778-79. Valley Forge is now a state park.

TURNING POINT OF WAR FOR FREEDOM?

Victory at King's Mountain of High Importance.

The battle of King's Mountain stands unique in warfare. It was a fight between an army representing the British government and a volunteer band of American patriots without army equipment who collected for the purpose of protecting their homes and wreaking vengeance on an enemy which had been hanging and plundering those who resisted the authority of the British king.

To say that they saved America is not covering them with undeserved glory. When the battle of King's Mountain was fought the patriot cause in America was at low ebb. Benedict Arnold had turned traitor, the South was overrun with the enemy, tories were active and jubilant, Continental money was worthless and the government was bankrupt. The psychology of the situation was all against Washington and his soldiers. Then came the feat of these southern patriots like a gleam of light through the darkness. The news spread quickly that the South was beginning to shake off the yoke of the oppressor once more. Men who were wavering took on fresh courage. The army passed through its terrible winter at Morristown without disbanding and then with the coming of spring America's fortunes began steadily to rise.

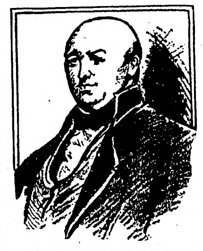


Col. John Sevier, Who Borrowed State Funds to Equip His Men for the Battle of King's Mountain.

The events leading up to King's Mountain may be briefly told, writes Frank P. Litschert in the National Republic Magazine. With the surrender of Charleston to the British the situation of the patriots in the Carolinas seemed steadily to grow worse. Many men gave up their arms and took the protection offered by the British crown. It seemed that the rebellion in the South Atlantic region had been crushed. There were some patriots, of course, like Sumter and Marion, who refused to submit, and left their homes to the torch of the enemy, retreating into the wilderness.

So was the army of mountain men disbanded after a brief but glorious career. Its work was important. As Irving tells us, King's Mountain turned the tide of southern warfare, disarranged Cornwallis' plans and made possible the final result. The patriots in the Carolinas were encouraged, the tories disheartened. The entire aspect of affairs was changed.

All honor is therefore due to these hardy men of the mountains and wilderness, real soldiers worthy of the name America. To quote from Governor Taylor of Tennessee in an address to the memory of one of their leaders, John Sevier: "They were not Don Quixotes, seeking ridiculous adventure; nor Hotspurs risking fate for fame, but they were men built from the ground up, with homes and families to defend. Every man was a soldier, every woman a heroine and every cabin a fortress."



Col. Isaac Shelby, Who Helped to Gather the Backwoods Army That Defeated the British at King's Mountain.

HERE is our text for this, the one hundred and forty-ninth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence: That the destiny of this republic is guaranteed neither by history nor tradition, however glorious, but lies in the hands of millions of Americans now alive.

Carolyn Made Her Choice

By MARTHA M. WILLIAMS

(Copyright.)

THE Risleys had taken Carolyn at birth, from a dying mother's arms—homeless, friendless, everything but nameless. The name plus some stirring of humanity had saved her from the county house. Raleighs had been big folks way back yonder, said the elders—'most anything might happen to this little trick, who besides the name, had unmistakably the Raleigh favor. The Risleys did not say so, but thought so all the more strongly for their silence. Selfmade, masterful, all they saw in the girl baby, potentially a cap-sheaf for their soaring ambitions. Son Ebbett, aged seven, would never have brothers or sisters—to raise up and train a proper wife for him, dowered with Raleigh blood. Raleigh traditions would give him splendid help in his upward climb.

So Carolyn had been cherished rather more than if she had been born to them—they gave her all but the essentials, love and freedom. They even forgave her lack of regular beauty, in consideration of her air—her distinctive look of race. It fretted them a bit that she would be spoiled, overbearing toward other children—she had never heard the phrase but seemed intuitively to sense the obligation of nobility. Especially towards Ebbett, slow-witted, shy, awkward. But he had won Carolyn's smile.

Ebbett, scorning mere booklearning, had been drafted by kind Fate into Life's university. A pioneer, born out of time, he loved the woods, the waters, the creatures of the wild; shooting, trapping, trailing, fairly enthralled him. He came to man's estate, a marksman of renown—inevitably he had drifted into companionship with men of like taste. Thus he had been at home less than a year in all the five that lay betwixt Carolyn and womanhood. Now for eighteen months he had been ranging tropic jungles, sports brother to the most famous explorer of his time. Little news had come out from them—still it was certain no ill had befallen the expedition; further it was nebulously understood the expedition might come back to civilization early in the new year.

At thought of that Carolyn now thrilled, now shivered. She had all the old fondness for Ebbett—but she yearned inexpressibly for choice. He must know the family plan—suppose he resented it dumbly even as she did? He would never let her guess it—he was much too kind for that. Marriage lacking love, either side or both, would be purgatory—of so much she was sure. If he loved her—there she stopped short in her musings—but suddenly her face was tinged to match the glowing leaves.

As she lifted her face for a last caress from them a motor purred swiftly up the drive. An odd vehicle, well-worn and dusty. Its door opened deliberately—as deliberately two men stepped out—Carolyn stared hard a second, then darted within crying tremulously: "Wake up, everybody! Mother! father! Ebbett—!" there breath failed her—for ten seconds she was dizzy. A rousing shout steadied her.

"Here's your new son—Danny-Joe hasn't got any white folks, so, of course, he gets a share in you-all," Ebbett explained dragging forward something as tall, as sunburned, as clean-cut as himself. "Danny-Joe Barkley you know—whoever pals with one of us two has got to pal with the other."

"I'm willin'," from Dad Risley. Ebbett tight in his mother's arms had no breath for speech beyond a smothered: "Babe?" Five minutes later, freed of ma, but crushing dad's hand in a painful grip, he said, reprovingly: "Why'n't you make your manners, Babe? Here I been tellin' Danny-Joe all that long sail home about the Raleigh beauty we had in captivity—"

"Liar! You never spoke her name. If you had—" Danny-Joe stopped staring hard. "If you had," he repeated, "we'd have been here a year ago—"

"I don't see why?" Ebbett began.

"Of course not—your youth hasn't been shadowed by hunting an elusive heir to a million," Danny-Joe said. "My mother's sister eloped with the Raleigh scapegrace, and thus got herself disinherited. But, at the very end, granddad dreamed there was somewhere a child of his blood—and laid it on me to find it, and pay over the million. Now I see her, even without the name, I should know—her mother's picture life size, is the joy and comfort of my mother's living room."

Some six hours later Ebbett, sauntering with Carolyn through the still gorgeous garden asked her suddenly: "Babe—now you're a real rich lady, what are you goin' to do with yourself?"

"Why—get married I think—if the right man will have me," Babe said outblushing the reddest late rose.

"Tell him I dare him not to," Ebbett said smiling oddly.

"Then why don't you take me?" Carolyn retorted, making to fling herself into his arms.

"Well! Of all the deceitful little rascals!" Ebbett ejaculated. "I thought you hated me like pizen—else I never could have stayed away."

"I didn't—I only wanted a chance to choose," Carolyn cried.

"And I'm right glad you got it—saves a heap of trouble," Ebbett said judicially—but with his lips buried in her soft hair.

ANSWERED:

three vital questions you have asked about used car allowances

1 "What is my present car worth?"

Answer: Your used car has only one fundamental basis of value: that is what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.

2 "Why should dealers in different makes of cars offer me allowances that differ materially?"

Answer: Your used car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.

3 "Is it true that the largest allowance offered means the best deal for me?"

Answer: The largest allowance is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; sometimes it is not. An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.

First judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your used car. Remember that after all you are making a purchase, not a sale.

Nothing to Flag Her Down

Ardath, age five, was being taught some of the rudiments of reading by her mother, who explained that coming to a period at the end of a sentence meant for her to stop. A few nights later, at the dinner table, she was chattering away with no noticeable likelihood of there being any pauses, when her mother asked her why in the world she didn't stop talking. She replied: "I guess, mother, I don't see any periods."

Big Transportation Bill

The annual transportation bill of the United States is about $13,000,00,000, divided about equally between the railroads and motor-trucking systems, says Liberty.

"Butch" Bedbug, burglar, starts his night's work

Millions of others are starting, too! Be ready for them!

MAKE NO MISTAKE! There's only one way to exterminate bedbugs. That's with a liquid. Don't waste time shooting a spray at them. No spray can possibly reach their young and eggs.

Bedbugs are in the woodwork, along the base-boards—not in the bed clothes, as you may have thought. Don't waste time using a powder. Bedbugs don't eat. They suck. That's why only a liquid can exterminate them.

Peterman's Discovery is the right liquid. It soaks down into their nests. It will exterminate all bedbugs, all their young and eggs in any house in 48 hours.

Here is the right insecticide for each insect:

PETERMAN'S DISCOVERY, Liquid—exterminates bedbugs.
FLYOSAN, Liquid Spray—kills flies and mosquitoes.
PETERMAN'S ROACH FOOD—exterminates cockroaches.
PETERMAN'S ANT FOOD—exterminates ants.
PETERMAN'S MOTH FOOD—protects against moths.

You must have a specific insecticide for each insect. No single insecticide will exterminate them all. We have had nearly 50 years' experience. We know that is true.

Peterman's has the right insecticide for each insect. On sale wherever drugs are sold.

CHAPTER X—Continued

"How did he get off?"

Bassett's voice was raised in his exasperation:

"Good Lord, Rawson, we weren't jailed here then. He could have had a boat hidden in one of the coves. This place wasn't escape-proof till you turned up. He could have rowed ashore and landed anywhere, and that's what he's done."

"Unless he's here."

"Here on the island?" Williams spoke with an air of patient reminder: "Ain't we gone over it with a fine-tooth comb?"

Rawson pointed to the ceiling:

"How about that top story? A person—we won't say who—could have killed the woman, entered the house while the rest of you were on the beach, put back the pistol, and gone upstairs."

Williams made a motion to heave himself up from his chair.

"Well, if that's how you feel about it let's go up and have a look for the person."

"We needn't do that just now. They're as safe as if they were behind bars. There's something I want to do down here first—have a talk with Miss Tracy. She may be able to give us a little light."

"She can't help you," said Bassett. "They weren't on confidential terms. She'd be the last person he'd tell anything to."

He believed what he said, but his heart sank. Anne to be dragged through another interrogation, an interrogation with a hideous suspicion behind it!

Rawson rose:

"Perhaps so, but it's worth trying. She may know more than you think; sisters sometimes do. And she certainly must have more knowledge of him than any of us. We'll soon see."

He moved toward the door.

"I'll go up and get her now."

CHAPTER XI

When Anne went up to her room she took a seat by the window where she could see the channel. It was an undecipherable blackness, its farther limit defined by the shore lights. But the night was very still, the sagging weight of cloud hung low, pressing down sounds.

She closed the door and decided now she might rest, not go to bed yet, but lie down and try to get back to courage and control. She took off her dress and put on her negligee, and with hands raised to loosen her hair heard a step on the stairs. It struck upon her ear, heavy and quick, a man's step, and she remained as she was, her arms lifted, her eyes staring into her reflected eyes in the mirror. She stood thus till it stopped at her door. When the knock came and Rawson's voice spoke her name, the hands dropped and she moved to the door.

"Can you come downstairs for a minute?" the voice said, low and guarded. "I'm sorry to ask you to get up."

She opened the door. "I hadn't gone to bed. Yes, of course I'll come. You want to—"

"Just ask you a few more questions. I'm glad I didn't wake you."

She followed him along the passage and down the stairs. When she entered the library her glance fell on Bassett facing her across the room, his brows drawn low over the dark trouble of his eyes. His look told her of anxiety, apprehension and a passionate concern for her.

Williams indicated an armchair near the desk:

"Take a seat, Miss Tracy. Sorry we've had to call you down."

She fell into it and, as the men settled themselves in theirs, ran her tongue along her dry lips and took a deep breath of air into her lungs.

"We've been making some inquiries about your brother, Miss Tracy," Rawson began. "About his leaving here. You told us, as I remember, that you knew he went."

"Why, yes, he went."

"Did you see him go?"

"No—I didn't see the boat go, I was upstairs, but of course he went."

"We've found out that he didn't," said Rawson.

"Mr. Rawson's seen Gabriel." Bassett spoke very gently. "And he says he didn't take Joe over."

"But I don't understand. He was all ready. I said good-by to him. It was his holiday, he'd been looking forward to it, he was crazy to go."

"And he told you he was going, wanted to go. Was he jolly and good-humored like a person starting on a holiday?"

"Yes—why shouldn't he be? It was what he'd been longing to do for years. After I left him I went to my room and dressed and when I went downstairs I saw that his bag and fishing rod, which he told me he'd left by the entrance, were gone, and I thought of course he was. And he has, he's gone some other way."

"You're sure he's gone?" Rawson's emphasis on "you're" was heavy.

She looked at him with startled eyes:

"Yes, aren't you? Why, you don't think he's here?"

Rawson addressed Bassett:

"Didn't you tell me he was to stop tonight in Bangor and meet his friend?"

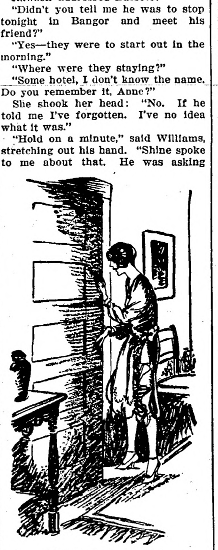
"Yes—they were to start out in the morning."

"Where were they staying?"

"Some hotel, I don't know the name. Do you remember it, Anne?"

She shook her head: "No. If he told me I've forgotten. I've no idea what it was."

"Hold on a minute," said Williams, stretching out his hand. "Shine spoke to me about that. He was asking about a hotel in Bangor young Tracy recommended—the Algonquin Inn. That may be it."



She Opened the Door.

Rawson swung the desk chair round and drew the telephone to him:

"We can find out in a minute."

They sat without moving while Rawson made the connection.

"Is there a Mr. Tracy there—Joe Tracy?" And then a period of listening, punctuated with grunts of assent from Rawson. Then, "Mr. Travers has gone—left on the six-fifteen this evening—I see." A silent stretch and a final "Thanks—that's all I wanted. Much obliged." The receiver clicked into its hook, and Rawson swung the chair toward them:

"Travers has been there waiting since last night. Tracy never showed up. Travers had no message from him and left this evening for Moosehead lake."

For a moment there was no comment. Anne raised her eyes, the sides of the room looked a long way off and the light seemed to have intensified to a violent glare as if she were sitting in the midst of a dazzling illumination.

"I don't know what to make of that," she said, the words dropping slowly with spaces between.

"Neither do we, Miss Tracy," said Rawson, and leaning back, has hands clasped over his stomach, he gazed intently at her through his horn-rimmed glasses.

"Yes, you do," she said and heard her voice hoarse and changed. "You've made something of it already. And what you've made is lies—wicked lies."

Then she had seen it. Bassett made a step forward, but she leaped to her feet, oblivious of him:

"You think he did it, just because you can't find him. That's all he's done, gone away. You must be crazy. What would he do it for? Don't you have to have a reason to commit murder?

"They weren't good friends. I don't know why—I asked her, but she wouldn't tell me. And what was it—a quarrel, a grievance? But that wouldn't make him want to kill her!"

"I've told them that, Anne," Bassett implored; "there's no use going over it."

Rawson leaned suddenly forward and caught her by the wrist:

"What did you see last night in the living room?"

If he had meant to surprise her he failed of his purpose. She hung back from his grip and said with defiant emphasis:

"I saw nothing!"

"Are you sure it was a book you came down for?"

"It was a book, as I told you."

"You could read a few hours after your friend was murdered?"

"I could try to read—it was better than thinking."

"You've got a pretty cool head, Miss Tracy," he added, and relinquished her hand. She fell back in her chair as if his hold upon her had been all that sustained her in an upright position. He rose, looking down at her, curious and unsatisfied:

"I guess we'll call a halt for a while. We've other work to attend to. But wait here till we come back; we may have to do some more talking." He turned to Williams and gave a jerk of his head toward the hall. "Come on, we'll go up there now."

He walked to the door, Williams following him. As it shut after them Bassett went to her and bent over her chair. She held him off with a hand on his breast and whispered:

"Where are they going?"

"Upstairs, to the top story."

She clutched the lapels of his coat:

"He's there, he's up there."

"He—who?"

"Joe!"

Bassett stared into her eyes. He thought her senses were giving way:

"Anne, darling, what's the matter? Joe's not here—you've just said so yourself."

"I said what wasn't true—he's there."

He caught her arms and drew her to her feet:

"What do you mean?"

"I know it, I've seen him."

"Seen Joe himself?"

"Last night when I came down for the book. He's hiding up there—I thought he was safe. And now they'll find him."

"I saw the launch go without him and I was going to speak to you, but Shine was there and I couldn't. Then she was killed and I didn't know what to think, where he'd gone, anything! But that night I heard them say there was a man on guard at the causeway, and I came down to tell him in case he was here and would try to get across. And then I saw him."

"Where?"

"In the living room. He came from the door into the kitchen wing and I whispered it."

"Did he say anything?"

"No—just ran the way he'd come in. And then I knew—" she stopped and closed her eyes. "Oh, I didn't know it but I thought it. Can it be true—could he have done it? One minute I'm sure and then I can't believe it; and I don't know, I don't know."

Drawing away from him she ran to the door, and opening it, stood listening. He followed her and with pauses for that tense listening, she told him of her visit to the top floor.

"Will you help me?" she whispered. "Will you help me whatever happens?"

He nodded, there was no time now for words. He motioned her to sit down, and moved back from her, listening to steps which were crossing the living room, entering the hall. Were they louder than they had been going up, were there three pair of feet where there had been two? They stopped at the door, it opened and Rawson and Williams entered.

Rawson spoke to Anne:

"You can go upstairs, Miss Tracy. We'll put off the rest of our talk till tomorrow. You better try to get some rest. And kindly remember to stay in your room. I don't want any mistakes made about that tonight."

She murmured words of compliance and rising with pale composure left the library.

When the door shut on her Bassett said: "You got nothing up there at all?"

Notebooks in Pockets Have Banished String

The man who tied a string around a finger to remind him of errands to be done for his wife has forever departed. The string has been banished by the notebook so effectually that if ten men were challenged to account for their good memories nine would display notebooks and the tenth would confess that he made memoranda of his errands on the back of a letter.

Even the farmer no longer drives to town with his finger tied around with a string. He may not have the businesslike notebook, but somewhere in a pocket there is a letter he intends to answer some time, or a bill of sale, or a notice from the road overseer, and on the back of one of these he writes down the errands he is to do for his wife. There hasn't been a string jogger of memory in his generation.

"In the old days," explains an elderly man, "there were few pockets, no convenient scraps of paper and not always pen and ink or a pencil. But always in one of these pockets was a bit of string. The men of my days grew up with string in their pockets. People carry pencils nowadays instead."

Holland has Dutch Guiana and several islands, while the British also have a slice of Guiana, British Honduras, Canada and numerous West Indian islands. Busy smokers of today select Camel as their favorite smoke

PRESENT-DAY people, the fastest workers of all time, claim their right to enjoyment. And they choose Camels for the utmost in smoking pleasure.

Camel is made to please and delight the modern, experienced smoker. It is rolled of the choicest tobaccos grown. It is matchlessly blended for mildness and fragrance in the smoking.

Let Camels demonstrate their goodness and you'll know why the smokers of today choose them over all other cigarettes. For that exalted sense of taste-satisfaction, no other smoke can compare with this one. "Have a Camel!"

Leap-Year Reckoning Quite Simple Matter

The year 1928 is a leap year, as it is divisible by four without remainder. There has been no change in the calendar for the last two centuries. As the exact length of a year, determined by the earth's revolution around the sun, is a little less than 365¼ days, the old Julian calendar, giving a leap year every four years, was inexact. A new calendar, called the Georgian, was proposed and adopted by most Christian nations in the Sixteenth century or later, to rectify this error. This calendar provides for 97 leap years in each 400 years. The only difference from the Julian calendar is that century years, such as 1600, 1700, 1800, 1900, etc., are not leap years unless they are divisible by 400 without remainder. Thus 1600 and 2000 are leap years, while 1700, 1800, and 1900 are not leap years.

Curious Bird

More than 300 different kinds of birds were brought from South America by Ludlow Griscom of the American Museum of Natural History in New York. One of the most curious in the collection is the motmot. "This bird," says Griscom, "bites its own tail. It is green and so closely resembles the color of the leaves that one can only see it by looking for the side-to-side movement of its tail, which resembles a pendulum in regularity."

Itching for Trouble Defect in Character

A young man had applied for a certain position and his possible employer was getting some sidelights on the applicant's character. "Why, he's all right," said those who knew him best. "He's young and sometimes foolish, but he means all right."

"That is not satisfactory," said the employer. "What's the doubt about him?"

"Well," was the hesitating reply, "he rather has a habit of defying authority, just for the sake of defying it. He doesn't care particularly about breaking the rules or the laws, but he seems to have a complex which makes him antagonistic toward anyone over him. He will probably do his work well, but he will always be itching for an opportunity to sass you a bit."

"Guess that's enough," said the employer, and he looked elsewhere for an employee.—Springfield Union.

Two Accidents Monday Night

When driving home with his family from Warren on Monday evening, Adolph Otto of Radium had the misfortune of having his Ford turn upside down in the ditch near Radium. Mr. Otto was hurt quite bad according to the reports given out by witnesses who saw the accident. The rest of the family escaped with only a few bruises and and a shaking up. The accident happened on account of head light trouble.

Upon returning home late Monday evening from having attended the county fair and fourth of July celebration at Warren, Leo Horien and family met a bunch of hootch hound about 3 miles west of Stiener, who upon meeting their car took all the road forcing Mr. Horien to take the ditch in order to avoid a head-on collision. Mr. Horien tried to stop his car suddenly when he noticed the approaching machine make a direct drive towards his car, but his brakes grabbed too hard on one wheel tearing off one of the rear tires, which forced the Ford sedan to turn over on its side into the road ditch.

No one was hurt and the only damage done to the car was a bent fender. The poor sport who forced them to have such a punk midnight entertainment drove on without offering any assistance after he or they seen them turn over.

Robber On Vacation

A robber who has been employed quite steadily at Baudette this spring must have had a sort of vacation last week, which caused his slack-up in keeping business places open at night when the owners tried to sleep. Last week he had enough gumtion to break in the back door in soft drink parlor and steal a gum machine containing a small sum of money while the owner was gone 20 minutes.

Weddings Popular

Weddings seem to have been very popular last week according to the number of licenses issued by A. C. Swandby, clerk of court. Those who have secured licenses are as follows: Perry W. Kemp and Adele Melgaard of Argyle; Edward Hill and Hilda Waisanen of Holt;; Oscar L. Magnuson of St. Paul and Irene C. Hallin of Newfolden; Mabel E. McGlyn and Edward Carpenter of Stephen; Samuel Beseau of Argyle and Angeline Sabers of Florien; Herman Peterson and Thea Johnson of Holt; John Ward of Thief River and Cecelia Carlson of Stephen; August O. Rokke of Newfolden and Anna Stovig of Grand Forks; Edwin L. Swanson Thief River and Mabel E. Sheveland of Newfolden.

THE NEW MENACE

Hitch-hiking its way towards the nation's corncrib, the European corn borer is threatening to destroy crops to the value of billions of dollars and chase skyward the cost of production. If it worms its way into the Wabash and Mississippi Valleys, it can readily float downstream, spread out and become more difficult to control. Proper cooperation of all concerned will, no doubt, enable us to continue to grow corn profitably.—Agricultural Bulletin, American Bankers Association.

A corn and apple show is to be an annual feature at a bank in Baltimore County, Maryland. Another banker has been able to get his county to "thinking corn," over 500 farmers planting improved corn. Many other bankers in the state are giving moral support and funds to this work.

Snail-Eating Hawk

A hawk that hunts snails is a native of Florida. It is known as the "Everglade Kite," and is found over a large part of the state. It shows great skill in extracting the snail without breaking its shell.

—16—

"Not a thing," answered Rawson. "But we were at a disadvantage; not enough light, and it's a good-sized place. We'll comb it over tomorrow morning by daylight. Of course he could have got out on the island—all that kitchen wing's kept open. He might have been lying low up there all yesterday and have come down last night. All quite possible but—well, we'll know tomorrow." He walked to the window and looked out. "Dark as a pocket!" He turned to Bassett: "When the tide's full out could a person get across that channel except by the causeway?"

"There are places where they might swim the stream in the middle. It's a deep strong current but a good swimmer could do it."

"He might try it—he must be pretty keen about getting off here. You know this shoreline. Suppose you go down and take up a station below the boathouse among those juniper bushes. That's a place a person might use as a sheltered start for a get-away. You can't see but you can hear. Take Williams' gun, and if there's a sound, challenge, if there's no answer, shoot. I'll come down with you, I want to take a look at Patrick and I'll stay round myself for a while."

He stepped to the sill of the window but Williams, feeling for his revolver, stopped him:

"Hold on a minute. I got an idea that I think'll help a bit. I've been thinking of it all day and if I'm not mistaken it'll land your man or your woman neater and easier than lying in wait for them outside where they know by this time we've got a guard."

Rawson turned back into the room: "Let's hear it—we want to clear this up tonight. But, Mr. Bassett, you go on. Stop and tell Patrick what you're doing and see that he's on the job. I'll be down with him later, unless Williams' idea opens up something new."

Bassett took the revolver and stepped out of the window.

He reached the boathouse and groped his way about it to find Patrick. Coming round the angle where the man was stationed he pronounced his name and was surprised to get no answer. He stretched a feeling hand which came in contact with a large warm bulk, immovable under his touch and giving forth a sound of heavy regular breathing. His own breathing stifled, his movements noiseless as a cat's he struck a match and sheltering it with his curved hand, held it out. In its glow he saw Patrick huddled on the bench, his shoulders braced against the wall, his head drooped forward in profound sleep.

Pressed against the wall, he calculated the distances about him. The approach to the causeway was to his right, an incline of rocky steps, and in the stillness he could hear the lightest foot descending them. On such a night Joe might venture again—would venture if his nerve still held. If he did it would be within the next hour, and if Patrick slept and Rawson did not come he would go by unchallenged.

A fitful breeze arose, carrying sea odors. He heard the murmurings of the tide growing lower, fainter, till they sunk to silence and he knew the bed of the channel was uncovered.

CHAPTER XII

Williams thought highly of his idea. It had come to him that morning while thinking of the person he had heard descending the stairs, the person he insisted was Mrs. Stokes.

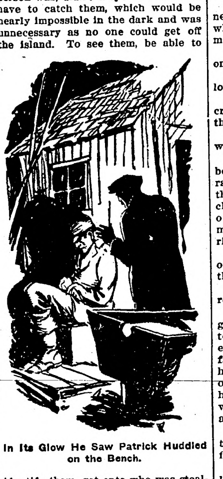
It was a simple and practicable plan—a watch kept for the rest of the night on the stairs and certain points of exit. In the face of positive orders two people had come from the upper floor the night before, Miss Tracy on an errand that Rawson thought suspicious, Mrs. Stokes, in Williams' opinion, to communicate with her husband. Even if both men were wrong some powerful incentive was making them take such risks and it was natural to suppose that incentive might be strengthened after twenty-four hours of strain and uncertainty. They might try it again, and to catch them at it, surprise them in the act—if they didn't break down on the spot—a little grilling would do the job.

Rawson looked at his assistant with an approving eye. The idea was good, excellent, and without waste of time they arranged the distribution of the watch.

Williams would take the front stairs, his particular prey was there and he had already located the position of the electric light button. Rawson would station himself in the kitchen with its two doors one to the outside, one to the hall. The living room they would assign to Shine, less important than either of the other ambushes, but commanding the entrance to the side wing and the path to the causeway and dock. Anyone descending the back stairs to make an exit from the house would either turn to the kitchen or go through the living room, and whichever way they took, would run into a trap. The men were satisfied, each one was detailed to the spot where he might expect to apprehend the object of his suspicion. The living room, central and exposed, might safely be left to Shine.

They found Shine in the butler's room sleeping soundly on the outside of the bed. He was made acquainted with the plan, and stumbling and heavy-eyed followed them. In the hall Rawson left them, taking his way to his hiding place, the other two faring on to the scene of Shine's duties. Here he received his instructions, special emphasis being laid on the door that led to the kitchen wing and the back stairs. Shine looked from the door to Williams with a perplexed frown. He did not like to admit—no more than he had liked to display the healthy vigor of his appetite—that he was so sleepy it was doubtful whether he could keep awake. In this embarrassing position, when he desired to acquit himself creditably and feared the weakness of his flesh, he too had an idea.

They just wanted to know who the person was, didn't they? He wouldn't have to catch them, which would be nearly impossible in the dark and was unnecessary as no one could get off the island. To see them, be able to identify them, get onto who was stealing round the house, was the point. If that was enough he'd a way of doing it, the surest and most efficacious way it could be done, no scrambling round the furniture, no uncertainty—he'd set his small camera for a flashlight photograph. The materials were all at hand. All he had to do was to get them ready and if anyone entered by the door he was to watch, he'd have their number before they knew it.



In Its Glow He Saw Patrick Huddled on the Bench.

Williams was interested—it was a neat trick and tickled his fancy. As he was ignorant of the process, Shine explained it, getting his properties from the cabinet as he spoke. The flash-light powder in a saucer on the table, then a double wire extending from it to a point above the door—the pair of antlers would answer. There the wire would be cut, one-half hanging down from the antlers, the other twisted round the door handle, its end standing out. When the door was opened the two severed ends would come in contact and make the circuit which would set off the powder. He did not tell Williams that the taking of the picture could be achieved whether he was asleep or awake, but that the camera would make its record whatever his state was an immense relief to his mind.

Williams left and he quickly completed his preparations. Before he made his final adjustment of the two wires he unloosed the latch of the door that it might open easily and noiselessly at the first push of a stealthy hand. Then, his camera in place, he turned off the lights. The room was suddenly plunged into Egyptian blackness; he had to feel for the chair he had pulled up, and, grasping the tripod, nearly upset it. Swearing under his breath, he found the arms of the chair and let himself down upon it carefully, to avoid creaking. The silence of the house closed around him, a silence that was like oblivion. The darkness showed no break as his glance traveled over it. A solid, impenetrable wall, it was hard to look at, the eye required something to rest upon. After he had stared into it for what seemed a measureless stretch of time, he felt he must shut his eyes for a moment of respite. He did so, his head drooped, nodded, sunk, and he lay a big crumpled figure held in the embrace of the chair.

A bang—in that silence as loud as a cannon shot—a rending burst of light waked him. Then from every side of the house noise broke, groans, screams, slamming of doors, thudding footfalls. Williams' voice shouted the first intelligible words:

"You got them—good work! Where the h—l are the lights?"

That shook Shine into consciousness, and he called to the gallery, whence a patter of bare feet and female cries rose:

"It's all right. Don't be scared. It's only a flashlight."

Male voices followed, harsh and loud, as the men came rushing in.

Rawson's from the left with the crash of the door flung back against the wall.

"What are you doing here? What was that?"

Bassett's from the entrance, his body colliding with furniture as he ran blindly forward. Somewhere in the darkness behind, Stokes', high and choked, breaking into curses. And over all Miss Pinkney's riding the tumult like the war cry of the Valkyries:

"Why don't some of you fools turn on the electricity? The button's on the right side of the door."

Bassett's hand found it and the room was flooded with light.

The women in straight white nightgowns stood on the gallery huddled together. The dreadful darkness lifted, they leaned over the railing, their faces pallid between hanging locks of hair, dropping a shower of questions on the men below. One of them was hysterical and gave forth a sobbing wail, and Williams shouted with angry authority:

"Keep quiet up there. Nothing's the matter. Didn't you hear it was a flashlight?"

Someone strangled a scream—Williams thought it was Flora but could not be sure. Then they made a simultaneous retreat to the bedrooms for negligees and slippers, while the men, gathered round Shine, listened to his explanation. No, he'd seen nothing and heard nothing, but he'd got the picture all right, whoever it was, he had them. Now he'd go and develop it—he could do that in a few minutes—and there was the projector in the corner he could use, throw it onto something where they'd all see. A sheet over that screen by the desk would do.

They urged him out, they'd attend to everything: hurry up with the picture. Williams was unable to hide his elation. His idea, augmented by Shine's, was a bull's-eye hit, and his voice showed an exultant excitement as he called to Miss Pinkney to bring a sheet. Rawson's satisfaction was less apparent, but his eye was alight with anticipation. If it was the boy, he had run back upstairs, for no exit had been attempted through the kitchen. With the whole house astir he'd be afraid to come down and they had him safe as a rat in a trap. Impatient at the wait for Shine's reappearance, he left the room, saying he was going to the boathouse for a word with Patrick.

The noise of the women's footsteps on the stairs came in a descending rush. They burst in, their voices going before them, a scattering of gasped, explosive utterances.

"Can't you d—d women keep still?" Stokes ground out between his teeth.

Altercations Are Made in Course of Years

Most people would think that the word admiral is a typical English expression. Its origin, however, is Emir el Bagh, which is Arabic for "Lord of the sea." The term captain comes to us direct from the Latin caput, meaning head.

The coxwain was originally the man who pulled the after-oar of the captain's boat, then known as the "cock's boat." Cock-boat itself is a corruption of the word coracle, a small round boat used for fishing. Commodore is nothing more than the Italian commendatore, or commander.

Frequently we hear about "Davy Jones." There was, of course, no such person, but should you speak of "Duffy Jonah's Locker," you have the original phrase. Duffy is the West-Indian negro term for the spirit of Jonah.

The term "dog watch" is a corruption of "dodge" watch, the "dodge" being an arrangement, to prevent men from being on duty every day at the same hours.

Oldest Fine Art

Architecture is the most ancient of the fine arts. The earliest dated architectural remains are those of the Babylonians, from as far back as 6000 B. C. Their building material was brick, and they were the first to construct vaults and arches.

Little Financial Gain From Immortal Works

William Shakespeare's emergence from practical poverty to comparative wealth near the close of the Sixteenth century was not the result of his play writing, but the earnings of his shares in the Globe and Blackfriars theaters.

His plays brought some returns, but not nearly enough at that time to enable him to buy New Place, the most imposing residence, with one exception, in Stratford. It is estimated that his shares paid him about $1,500 a year, equal to perhaps $12,000 at the present time. At about this time he received substantial sums from performances at court, and his fees as an actor and dramatist increased.

Previously he had at times been unable to remain clear of debt. In the tax records it is revealed that he was in arrears in 1596 when he moved from Shoreditch to Southwark, and later he paid the overdue taxes in installments. His wife also found it difficult to make both ends meet. Some time before 1596 she borrowed a sum from her father's shepherd and she had not repaid in 1601.

Oldtime Clocks That Are Now Curiosities

The first pendulum clock ever made in England was constructed by a Dutchman named Fromantel, in 1622. The clock given by King Henry VIII to Anne Boleyn on her wedding day is only four inches deep and but ten inches high—a real pigmy clock! There are also still some specimens of the old "Act of Parliament" clocks existing. These were so-called because Pitt, when prime minister, placed a tax on watches, and consequently taverns and other places where people gathered had large clocks made for the benefit of people who could not afford watches. At Buckingham palace there is a wonderful clock made by Lapine. This clock takes the form of a negress' head, and the hour numerals are shown in one of her eyes, whilst in the other are the minute divisions.

The Other Woman

Mrs. Margaret L. Wood, president of the Anti-Divorce league, said in a recent address in Topeka:

"If married people would only try to please one another, like single people! The whole secret of the unhappy marriage and divorce may be found in the words once spoken by a bricklayer's wife in a law court:

"'Judge,' said the poor woman, 'when a man starts brushin' his clothes and shampooin' his head and cleanin' his teeth. his wife knows there's somethin' in the wind.'"—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

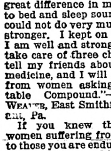
HOW MRS. WEAVER WAS HELPED

By Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound



As Mrs. Weaver herself says, "I was never very strong." This is a mild statement describing her condition, for, according to her letters, she was subjected to no small amount of ill health. Fortunately, her sister was familiar with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and begged Mrs. Weaver to try it. "After three or four weeks," writes Mrs. Weaver, "I felt a great difference in myself. I would go to bed and sleep sound, and although I could not do very much work, I seemed stronger. I kept on taking it and now I am well and strong, do my work and take care of three children. I sure do tell my friends about your wonderful medicine, and I will answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. Lawrence Weaver, East Smithfield St., Mt. Pleasant, Pa.

If you knew that thousands of women suffering from troubles similar to those you are enduring had improved their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, wouldn't you think it was worth a trial?

In some families, the fourth generation is learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Codfish Livers Rival Sun Rays

Scientists Point Benefits to Be Derived From Use of Sea Food.

Philadelphia.—Shades of Apollo and Izaak Walton! Here is science claiming that the only rival of the sun is found in "a poor fish."

We know that Sir Walter Scott sang once to the effect that "It's no' fish ye're buying—it's men's lives." We remember also the lines of an old Scotch song, a fishmonger's call in which a similar prophetic note was sounded. "Wha'll buy my caller herrin'?" the cry runs. "Ye little ken their worth."

"O, you may call them vulgar farin';
Wives and mithers maist desparin'
Ca' them lives of men."

One hundred years after these words rang out in the chill, foggy air of Scottish markets, scientists step from their laboratories long enough to tell us that, next to the sun, "desparin' wives and mithers" must depend upon a fish to maintain the stalwart limbs and stout backbone of the nation's youth.

In those few remaining regions of the earth where clothes are incidental, if not negligible, where the sun is given its chance to feed the bodies of men, we find, as a rule, that the natives of such Edens are straight as an arrow, well formed, strong, and happy.

It is when we reach civilization that we encounter frequent deformities, bowed legs, gawky knees, bulging wrists and ankles.

Clothes Rob Man of Sun.

The fact that we free to the sun only the few square inches of our face and the backs of ungloved hands is a primary factor in the general tendency in this and other civilized countries toward rachitic conditions. The average infant is too much overclothed when lying in the sun to derive its full benefits. Sun porches are light, cheery, and warm; but unless their glass is of a special type none of the helpful ultra-violet rays of the sun make their way inside.

Without sufficient sunlight or without sufficient supply in another form of the factor that is conveyed by the sun's rays, our children develop rickets, that starvation of bone structures that leaves them soft and flexible, producing various forms of deformity, including soft teeth, misshapen skulls, jaws and skeletal structures, and even constricted chests.

The elements that give proper strength to bones and teeth are calcium and phosphorus. These two elements cannot be utilized in bone growth, however, unless a third factor is present, just as a pile of coal is useless without ignition to convert it into heat.

Like Bones Made of Rubber.

This factor is vitamin D. Without this vitamin, calcium phosphate cannot be deposited sufficiently in the bony structures of the body. Although bones keep right on growing, the unfortunate child to whom they belong might as well have a rubber skeleton if the vitamin deficiency is not corrected.

The action of the ultra-violet rays of the sun upon one of the fatty components of our skin produces vitamin D or its physiological equivalent, according to researches conducted by Huldschinsky, Hess, Shipley, and other scientists.

Sunlight, then, is the natural protection against rickets.

But civilized man does not lead a natural life. Our mode of dressing and dwelling does not permit natural living. And it is not likely that we shall emulate the Polynesian soon by discarding our clothing for bared existence under a beneficent sun.

When it is known how important vitamin D is to life and health, it seems an odd prank of nature that this factor is absent in practically all foods used for human consumption except the liver of codfish. Probably nature felt that she was taking ample care of us by giving us sunlight. Then she permitted man to discover for himself how prodigally she provides for his welfare by storing this valuable factor in one of his commonest sources of food.

One Theory of Scientists.

Just how the cod manages to distinguish himself above all other animals of earth, sea and sky by monopolizing the storage of vitamin D is not clearly determined. One theory of scientists has it that the ultra-violet rays of the sun penetrate below the surface of the ocean and so irradiate the cod. This would presuppose that the cod's skin is especially sensitized to these rays as man's skin seems to be, just as if both cod and man were photographic negatives which, upon exposure to ultra-violet rays, produce a positive effect when developed in the chemistry of the body.

It is more likely, however, that the cod gets his sunlight by eating it. Study of the habits of the cod in Norwegian waters and in the waters off Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Maine have strengthened this theory. F. F. Berg of the Squibb laboratories watched the early spring surge of thousands of cod to the shallower, warmer waters near the Lofoten islands, where they came to spawn.

At this period of a cod's life he develops a ravenous appetite. And it is what nature provides to satisfy that hunger that offers another theory in explanation of the fact that cod liver oil is the most prolific source of vitamin D known to man.

Piscatorial Drama.

This piscatorial drama is very much like the "house that Jack built." Great shoals of herring are loosed by nature into the waters near Norway and our northeastern coast just as the cod feels these pangs of hunger. So here is the cod that gives us vitamins. Here are the squid that are eaten by the herring that are eaten by the cod that gives us the vitamins. Here are the mosses and sea plants that are eaten by the squid that are eaten by the herring that are eaten by the cod that gives us vitamins.

Day after day, week upon week, the sun pours its rays down upon these sea plants. The squid themselves do little more than float around near the surface of the sea, absorbing still more ultra-violet rays. From that point on it is obvious how, theoretically, the codfish acquires his vast store of vitamin D by literally eating sunshine.

It has been only a few years since the existence of vitamin D was recognized. In fact, its identification came about through experiments by Prof. E. V. McCollum of Johns Hokpins university with cod-liver oil. From that moment, the medical profession moved with reinforced courage against the threat of rickets. The late Dr. Emmet Holt, at the time of his death, was stressing the importance of dependence of sound health in adult life upon building bones, blood and muscles in childhood.

Would Reduce Teeth Ills.

It is claimed that, if the perfect condition of bone, blood and muscle in new-born children had been maintained in the last century through sufficient vitamin D supply, dental statistics would not show that 98 per cent of the people of the United States have imperfect teeth. There would have been less excuse for rheumatism and heart and kidney troubles, which are, in fact, after-effects of some local infection.

Authorities are urging that the growing generation of children be granted the heritage that is their right under the sun. Plenty of sunlight is advocated, but, at best, the sun alone under modern living conditions cannot assure sufficient vitamin D for a stout-limbed posterity.

Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association, states in a recent article:

"One of the greatest discoveries of the last five years has been the establishing of the fact that cod-liver oil has specific properties in preventing the development of bone diseases of infancy and in aiding proper growth. Under the unfeigned encouragement of the medical profession, child welfare agencies have preached the doctrine of liberal administration of cod-liver oil in infancy." Doctor Fishbein's article also stated that the council on pharmacy and chemistry of the American Medical association agreed upon advising "routine administration of cod-liver oil to all growing infants provided the product had been standardized as to its actual potency."

Every Wharf Had Its Keg.

Long before we had knowledge of vitamins, cod-liver oil was used. Coast dwellers and seafaring folk drank it in quantities as a means for withstanding exposure to cold weather and as a tonic. Their method of extracting it was crude. Every wharf had its keg sitting in the sun, the barrel full of cod livers, the oil separating and rising to the top where it was skimmed off.

Modern methods of rendering oil include establishment of plants near enough to the fishing banks so that livers may be received fresh from the catch with a minimum of vitaminic loss through exposure to the air.

From a modest position as a by-product of the fishing industry, the securing of livers for their oil is assuming an important and valuable major position. It is estimated that the world's output of cod-liver oil in 1925 was approximately 2,800,000 gallons, or 94,000 barrels of 30 gallons each. When it is known that it takes about six tons of codfish to yield enough liver to produce one barrel of cod-liver oil, some idea can be gathered of the gain that thousands of fishing families experience as a result of the laboratory discovery of vitamin D.

More Vitamin A Than Milk.

While cod-liver oil is essential chiefly for its content of vitamin D, the fact that it is also a rich storehouse of vitamin A is by way of being a bonus that nature has thrown in for good measure. Vitamin A promotes growth and builds resistance against pulmonary infections, colds, pneumonia, tuberculosis, and the like. It is as essential as vitamin D, and the complete absence of one or the other generally results fatally. Vitamin A, unlike vitamin D, is present in other foods, principally in butter from cows that have been fed on green food, in milk and cream, and in green vegetables such as spinach.

When it is known, however, that one pint of cod-liver oil is as rich in vitamin A as at least 1,200 pints of the best grade A milk, the greater concentration of the factor in oil becomes apparent.

Knowing that only two sources of the vital vitamin D exist, how truly we may say that a poor fish is elevated to a position where it alone vies with the sun in the service that both render mankind. It is in this service that hundreds of thousands of men are fishing the seas for better babies. With the promise of a sturdier race through ample access to the essential vitamin D, we may well sing along with Sir Walter Scott, "It's no' fish ye're buying; it's men's lives."

To Give Away Beams From White House

Washington.—Sections of lumber from the White House roof probably will be scattered as relics to all parts of the country. Various organizations are writing in, asking pieces for use in making gavels.

The large beams are of long-leaf Georgia pine. Those unexposed to the weather are described as in excellent preservation. Museums also have requested pieces of the wood.

President Coolidge has given no instruction about what shall be done with the wood and nails taken from the old attic, but it is assumed that requests of museums will be granted and that permission may be given for turning some of the timber into gavels.

Can Do All but Act, So She Runs Shows

Hartford, Conn.—Miss Marian Pullar, one of the few American women who are professional stage managers, has a record many young women would envy.

She was on her way to success as an artist, but her desire to act interfered with her studies, so she turned to the stage. Then the war came and she became a Red Cross worker, in which capacity she won the Croix de Guerre and other decorations. After her war experience she says:

"Acting was the one thing I just couldn't do, so I turned to stage managing."

AMERICAN WOMAN RUNS HISTORIC FRENCH HOSTELRY

Wife of Frenchman Amazes Village Peasants by Her Business Energy.

Les Andelys, France.—A brisk, curly-haired American woman, graduate of Wellesley college in 1912, is the hostess of one of France's most famous historic inns.

Mme. Gwyndd Champsaur, formerly Miss Weller of New York and Montreal, assists her French husband to dispense to Europeans and Americans the kind of hospitality to which both are accustomed. Between them they contrive with equal facility corn on the cob and calvados, the famous apple brandy of Normandy.

Steam heat, baths and an electric sewing machine have been installed in the old-time inn, known as the Hostellerie du Grand Cerf, "historic monument" of France, on the Deauville road.

Modern celebrities stop at the hotel, which has been patronized by famous people for 400 years. Walter Scott and Victor Hugo stopped there, and the father of Henry IV, Antoine de Bourbon, was brought to the house mortally wounded after the seige of Rouen. The building is decorated with the salamander device of Francis I, patron of its builder, Nicholas Duval.

Madame Champsaur does many things that amaze the village peasants, although they are her sworn friends. They never grow accustomed to the sight of her driving an automobile bareheaded, with a pair of Chow dogs on the seat beside her.

They remember when she pitched into the labor of preparing in three weeks at the cabled demand of an American millionaire a country cottage, with baths, near the inn.

She pushed many wheelbarrows full of dirt for the "old world" garden, which had to bloom in less than a month. She assisted with the renovating, papering and carpentering. The cottage was ready when needed.

The old inn is a treasure house of antiques. As it passed from hand to hand many relics of the past disappeared. Peasants occasionally bring these relics to the American woman, without explanation. They appropriated the objects to save them from vandalism, she says.

Now It's Hard to Keep the Girls on the Farm

Washington.—Even the girl won't stay "down on the farm."

In a report to the general bureau of agricultural emonomics only 4 per cent of the girls who said they liked farm life expressed a preference for farming as a livelihood.

Teaching is preferred by 55 per cent, 7 per cent prefer nursing or social work, 15 per cent choose business, 2 per cent choose the arts and 9 per cent express a wish for other miscellaneous occupation.

Making Love to Mademoiselle

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

(Copyright.)

CLARKE BUFFINGTON was doing about forty an hour on the stretch of road which runs from Quebec to Montreal.

"Heck!" he grumbled, guiding the car deftly between a bus and a hayrick. "This is a healthy way of enjoying the scenery—all by one's lonesome in a place where everyone speaks French, and not the sort of French you learned in college either. What I would like—"

On an unexpected curve, the roadster swerved to the soft shoulder, slewed, balanced, then turned over into a bit of meadow three feet lower than the built-up road.

When Clarke woke to a real cognizance of his surroundings, he was lying on a very high, very comfortable bed. On the walls were strange pictures and about the room was unfamiliar furniture. An old woman in a black dress that reached to the floor stood measuring something out of a bottle into a spoon.

Feebly he recalled what had occurred and stirred slightly.

At once the old woman came over and laid a wrinkled hand on his forehead. "Pauvre garcon!" she murmured. "Pauvre garcon!"

But the following morning when Monsieur le docteur, who could speak broken English, arrived, Clarke was able to get a light on his present situation. He learned that his spill had given him, along with lesser injuries, a fractured thigh. That it had been thought the long ambulance ride to the hospital at Three Rivers would be too much for him.

The doctor praised Madame Vadnais as a nurse "superbe."

Afterwards, Clarke lay thinking over his plight. Four hundred miles from home in what was, to all intents and purposes a foreign country. What should he do? Weakness made him homesick and his eyes filled with tears.

At that moment, the door opened gently. Hastily blinking back the tears, Clarke turned his head, expecting to see Madame Vadnais, the nurse "superbe," who was, his instinct told him, the tall old lady in black. But it was not Madame Vadnais.

The person who had come in was young and slender and beautiful.

"Bon jour, mademoiselle!" said Clarke, wishing he could rise and bow.

She answered him in French and she had to repeat what she said not once but several times before he understood it. He sighed to think that between himself and this enchanting girl, whom he took to be one of Madame Vadnais' several granddaughters, communication must be as tedious and limited as one-way traffic.

In the days that followed, he grew fond of the whole Vadnais family, from the grandmother, who nursed him, down to the several small children. There were two other young girls besides the blue-eyed Marie, but it was Marie whom he came very nearly to worship.

Each day she visited him, and each day he sought to understand her better. Sometimes old Madame Vadnais joined them and all three got considerable fun out of his attempts at the language.

The weeks passed quickly.

It was with mingled feelings that he took his first walk from the small green-shuttered house out to a bench in the sun. It was pleasant to smell the fragrance of cut hay, to look across the narrow strips of fenced fields stretching down to the river, to catch the gold gleam of a church dome towering above the village on the other side, knowing that many miles beyond lay the home to which he would be at last able to return.

But when he thought of Marie a strange ache troubled him. He knew that he had come to love her. He knew, also, that American men had married French girls and found happiness.

When he saw her coming toward him with a little smile on her face as if she cherished a secret joy, he flung any apprehension he might have felt to the wind.

"Marie," he began, rising somewhat unsteadily to meet her, "vous etes la—la—plus— Oh, hang it, if I could only tell her I love her in good plain English!"

From beneath curling lashes Marie looked up at him oddly. "Why don't you try?" she asked in plain English.

Clarke was too dazed to speak. Then, "What—why—" he stammered. "Marie—"

"Actually, I am Mary Leonard," said the girl. "A native of beautiful old Stockbridge. I roomed with Berthe Vadnais at the convent in Montreal and was visiting her when you had your accident. You took me for one of the family, and it seemed best to leave it that way and have the rest do so. The Vadnais would have felt continually shut out, if they knew we had so much in common.

"Besides," she said, laughing, "you know the strictness of French chaperonage. They would never have felt quite sure of the discreetness of our conversation. And now, if you have forgiven me, just what"—and here she blushed adorably, "were you about to say?"

Renewed strength flowed into Clarke's veins as he drew her to him. "[illegible]" he said tenderly, "My

A BATH TUB that tests automobiles

S-P-L-A-S-H through the bath tub goes the General Motors car. Out onto the slippery road it dashes. On go the brakes!

What is the reason for such torture of an innocent automobile?

The answer is that the engineers at the General Motors Proving Ground take nothing for granted. They want to know what happens when a car ploughs through water. They insist too on measuring, with special machines which they have built, just how quickly the car can be stopped and just how much pressure of the foot is required to stop it.

Altogether General Motors has 136 different tests by which cars are proved as they never have been proved before; nothing is left in doubt. All of which means that you are buying doubly assured safety, reliability and comfort when you choose a General Motors car.

HOW FAKE AUCTIONS GET YOUR MONEY

By W. R. MOREHOUSE

Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association

(This is one of a series of articles exposing the wiles of sharpers who are after your money.)

NEARLY everyone is ready "to take a fling" at getting something for nothing or at least for less than it is worth. Because of this many are duped into paying more than regular market prices for things they buy. This class of people is especially susceptible to the appeal of anything resembling an auction. Fake auctions with the cards stacked against the buyer are very common. They rank high among the fraudulent schemes of the country.

W. R. MOREHOUSE

The "here today and gone tomorrow" auction faker rents a fine looking house in some high-class section of the city in which he plans to operate. He furnishes this house with the cheapest imitations of high-class furnishings, with here and there a fine piece which is to serve for bait. Certain pieces are alleged antiques with a thread of glorious history behind them. Of others it is claimed that they have been handed down for generations, originating with some person noted in history or with some famous Southern family. Of other pieces it is maintained that they are made of rare and precious woods imported from far across the sea. The overstuffed furniture, it is claimed, is all high grade of standard manufacture.

Regardless of its superiority and antiquity, the furniture must be sold at once, for the owner is compelled to take an extended trip, the family physician having ordered travel and a change of climate as a means of saving his life. Nothing is to be spared and the deep slashings of the auctioneer's axe must go on with no price too low. Individual pre-auction sales, of course, will be arranged for persons who are unable to attend the auction.

The day of the sale is here. Purchasers are arriving. They are met at the door by the woman member of the outfit—a dramatic person who knows when to shed tears at the thought of having her happy home broken up and her valuable furnishings torn from her. She tells her sad story—how she must leave her home and go to distant lands with her husband whose health is broken and life in danger. But she is resigned to her "awful calamity" and will sell all her lovely furniture even at a great sacrifice.

Victims Clamor for Fake Pieces

As she directs attention to certain pieces of furniture her voice quavers. She almost sobs aloud as she names the price she is forced to accept. "Less than half the original cost, but price is no object. We must take the train tomorrow," and she wipes a tear from her eye. Fully convinced the sale is genuine, and sympathizing with the unfortunate woman, buyers clamor for the furniture.

But no sooner are the articles transferred from their setting in the slightly darkened rooms of their original owner and displayed in the sunlight of the purchaser's home, than the truth about the sale begins to dawn in the mind of each new owner. Close examination reveals that evidently this wonderful collection of furniture was but odds and ends and unsalable pieces picked up from second-hand stores by these fly-by-night fakers. Some proves to be the rankest of imitations of the cheapest grade, and the overstuffed is so poorly constructed that it squeaks and weaves under the lightest weight.

The Birds Have Flown

When those who have been cheated rush back to the house the next day, intent on making it "hot for the faker," they find hanging in the front window a sign, "For Rent." The birds have flown, without leaving any address.

Fake auctions are not exclusive to residences, but are sometimes staged in stores. We have reports of a certain furniture firm that failed, having on hand stock invoiced at $42,000. An auction sale was announced. As usual the stock must be closed out to satisfy creditors within a few days, regardless of cost. On the windows appeared glaring announcements of big bargains. Although represented as a legitimate sale, it had the earmarks of an auction by Messrs. Catch 'em and Skin 'em.

An investigation of the store made six months later disclosed that its stock was then larger than the day it announced the auction. Its sales in the interim had exceeded $600,000. The facts are that two trucks had backed up to the rear of the store nightly and unloaded new merchandise, principally odd lines and job lots picked up here and there at a bargain. Under the guise of a legitimate auction, or private sale at auction prices, fourteen times as much furniture was sold in the six months as the store contained at the time of the failure. Comparison of sale prices disclosed that victims were persuaded to buy liberally on the assurance they were getting sacrifice prices, when as a matter of fact they were actually paying from five to 25 per cent more than reliable stores were charging for better goods.

Fake auctions and private sales are used not only for furniture but also in the sale of jewelry and other merchandise. The lesson which this story teaches is that there is nothing to be gained by patronizing such sales. On the other hand, there is a better than 50-50 chance of sustaining a loss.

Not all auctions are fraudulent, for some are conducted fairly and honestly, but before you draw your savings from the bank and spend them for auction goods it will pay you to get the facts. For your own protection make it an unbreakable rule to confine your expenditures and investments to reliable firms and individuals. In dealing with them you are assured a square deal.

(A future article will present means to foil crooked promoters' wiles and how to separate good from bad investments.)

This is the time of the year when it is no easy job to keep sweet cream. Those who have resevoirs in connection with their deep wells usually have no difficulty, however, these last two months due to so much rain fall many have experienced trouble in keeping their cream in the well on account of water raising so rapidly that their cream cans would upset during the night.

There is no better and surer place for cream to be kept then in a cream cooler. So many find that they have sour cream in spite of having a cream cooler. To make it plain let us not forget that the only way to get results in having a cream cooler is to be sure you pump water often enough to keep the temperature of water in cooling tank below 60 degrees. A milk house in connection with your cream cooler is a good investment. Whenever you have your cream cooler inside you will find it doesn't require near as much water pumping to keep your cream cold.

I often hear patrons tell me that they can only pump as much as the stock drinks and when the cattle find water out in the pasture they cannot pump but very little water thru the cooling tank on account of water running over in stock tank. If you expect to get resutls from your cooling tank you will have to arrange some overflow pipe in your stock tank. At this time of the year to those who have a cooling tank you should pump water at least four and five times during a day. A few tons of ice put up in the winter time comes in very handy at this time of the year.

We have patrons using ice and I say their cream is both sweet and cold when it comes to the creamery. At all times bring the best kind of cream your conditions warrant. By that I mean if you expect your cream to be L. O. Lakes try and make the very best of that kind, if you know that some of your cream will be too sour and off flavor for either an X or 1st grade than by all means let it be the best kind of a 2nd grade.

It is very natural that as long as you do not expect to get a grade better than our lowest grade which is a 2nd that much care with that cream is no more money for you and quite often it is neglected which results in some very low score in our butter and consequently you are losing even though you do not see it on your cream statement, nevertheless we can only pay for butterfat equal to the amount we receive for our butter so it is plain to see where it pays to take best of care of your cream and to deliver a Land O' Lakes grade pays the very best.

Local Cooperative Making Progress

That the Holt Cooperative Livestock Shipping Association is making rapid progress is shown by the number of carloads of livestock that it has shipped out from Holt since it was organized in February.

Hilmer Moberg, manager for the local association, shipped out the eighth carload of stock from here Saturday. You get a good price for your cattle when you ship them with the association. Melvin Nohre had a small calf that was born about the middle of April, which he shipped last Saturday and he received $30.79 for it, which goes to show that good prices are paid.

The local association has done a business of over $13,000 since it shipped out its first carload of livestock to South Saint Paul on March 5.

Rawson re-entered. He had heard them as he came up the path and stopped on the threshold looking at Anne, waiting to see if she would speak. But she said nothing, standing by Bassett, her hand braced against a table, her glance on the floor. She knew Rawson was watching her and willed her form to an upright immobility, her face to a stony blankness. If she could hold herself this way, not move or speak, she could bear the tension. A touch, a word, and she felt that her body might break to pieces and her voice ascend in long-drawn screams to the skies.

The screen under its white covering was set in the place Shine had indicated, the projector put some distance back, facing it. To some of them these preparations had the hideous significance of those preceding an execution and all of them felt the deadly oppression of the approaching climax. The room was very still, as if an enchantment lay on it. At intervals Mrs. Cornell drew her breath with a low moaning sound, Stokes' hands clenched and unclenched on the chair-back and Williams looked at his watch. He began a guttural mutter of impatience and stopped as the door opened and Shine came in.

He came quickly, bringing an air of excitement to the already highly charged atmosphere. There was a bewildered agitation in his face, and his words were broken and uncertain as he answered Williams' question:

"Oh, yes, I got it—something—I can't quite make out—got me sort of flustered hurrying so. You'll have to stand away there, folks." He turned to the projector, adjusting it, then held the negative out toward Williams. "We'll probably lose this, Mr. Williams. Doing it so quickly I couldn't fix it. It'll likely melt with the heat in here, won't last more than a few minutes. You don't want to keep it, do you?"

"Go ahead. It's only the picture—that's all that concerns us."

"All right—it's your say-so. You'll get it in a minute now and by gum, I want to see—" he stopped, his breath caught, his hands busy over the machine. "Now, then, we're ready. Some one please put out the lights."

Miss Pinkney pressed the button and the room dropped into darkness.

A picture leaped into being on the screen. A door-frame backed by solid, indistinguishable black, the edge of a door, and, beyond it, the outlines melting into the darkness, the suggestion of a head and shoulders, only the face showing clear, looking at them with wide, questioning eyes—Sybil Saunders' face.

The silence held for a moment, then broke in an explosive volume of sound. The women's shrieks rose simultaneously—"Sybil! Sybil!" The name ran about the room, beat on the high ceiling and was buffeted from wall to wall.

"The dead woman!" Williams shook Shine's arm in his incredulous amazement.

"It is—it's her. I saw it when I developed it and I don't know—something's gone wrong."

A raucous cry rose above the chorus of female voices. Stokes had dropped his hold on the chair, his starting eyes fixed on the picture. From his lips, curled back like an angry dog's, came a strangling rush of words:

"She's dead. She's dead, for I killed her. I shot her—she's dead. She can't come back, she never can come back. I shot her as she ran—I killed her—I saw her fall—she's dead—dead!"

The words died in a groan. He pitched forward and lay a writhing moaning shape with hands that clawed and dug into the carpet. The men rushed at him, clustered about him, the women watching in dumb horror while the picture behind them slowly faded from the screen.

CHAPTER XIII

When they carried Stokes to his room they thought him dying, so ghastly was his appearance, so deathlike his collapse. Bassett telephoned to Hayworth for a doctor and before the man came Flora, singularly cold and collected now the fight was over, told them her husband was a morphia addict and showed them the case in his bag with the empty vial. In the two days' detention on the island his supply had been exhausted, the greatest strain of the many that had ended in his frantic confession.

In the excitement of the Stokes sensation the men had forgotten all about the picture and now, walking down the hall, they swung back to it. Bassett and Williams were baffled and confounded by it; it was one of the most startling of the whole chain of startling circumstances. Rawson was neither baffled nor confounded, having already arrived at a solution: Shine had played a trick, done it on purpose to see if it might not accomplish just what it had accomplished. He was loud in his praise of the photographer, it was a clever ruse that had brought things to a climax when they might have gone on bungling for days. Rawson was willing to admit his mistakes—he'd been sure of the boy and now it appeared that Bassett and Miss Tracy were right. Joe Tracy had evidently lit out secretly on some business of his own.

He dismissed the company with a curt command and as they made their hurried exits, jocularly congratulated Shine as the man who had pulled off a successful hoax. But the photographer looked rather shamefaced and denied the charge. He'd meant to take a picture, no funny business or fooling about it—but—he rubbed his hand over his tousled hair and grinned sheepishly. He was sleepy, that's what had been the matter, just plain doped with sleep so he didn't know what he was doing.

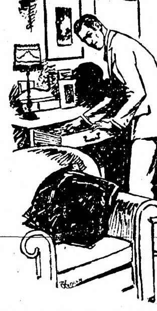
"Well, how do you account for the picture?" said Rawson. "Are you one of these people who can take spirit photographs?"

There was only one way of accounting for it. He hadn't opened the shutter and the picture was one of those he had taken of Miss Saunders the day of his arrival.

"You'd taken her like that—coming through the doorway?"

He'd taken two or three like that—he couldn't be sure how many. But he did remember posing her at both the front and rear entrances of the living room, trying to get effects of a dark background with her figure dimly suggested and the light on her face. It was evidently one of those pictures, must have been the last one he'd done, but he couldn't trust his memory on any small points. He'd been more shocked than he had any idea of, but he knew it now.

So that was that! Nobody's brains, nobody's deductive powers, or perspicacity or psychological insight had brought them to the goal. The bungling of a sleepy man had done the trick.



He Had Seen the Revolver in the Drawer of the Desk.

They were talking it over when the sound of Flora's voice stopped them. She was standing in the doorway, very white and very calm. Stokes was asking for them. Yes, she nodded in answer to Rawson's look, he was quite himself. The doctor had wanted him to wait till he was stronger, but he had insisted:

"He says he must speak now while his mind is clear. He seems to know it won't last and he can't rest till he's told everything."

They found him bolstered up in bed, a haggard spectacle, his eyes, sunk in darkened hollows, seemed to hold all the life left in his body. They hung on the entering men, then swerved to his wife and he made a motion for her to sit beside him.

"Im glad you've come," he whispered. "Glad it's over. If I'm going on now it can't be to anything worse than this last thirty-six hours."

The desire to free his mind possessed him. Rest, he said, rest was all he wanted and it was not for him till he had unloaded the intolerable burden he had carried since Sybil Saunders' death.

He had never intended to kill her—that was the one point of exculpation he insisted on. His love had made him mad, carried him beyond the inhibiting forces of honor, feeling, reason. That it was hopeless seemed to increase its obsessing power, and she had never for one moment led him to think it was anything but hopeless. Unwaveringly, from the first, her attitude had been dislike, aversion, a horror of his state of mind and himself.

His knowledge of the coming separation had been the igniting motive that caused the inner explosion. After their stay on the island she would go her way, keep her whereabouts hidden from him, and he might never see her again. The thought became unbearable, and led him to a resolution of wild desperation—he would get her alone, once more confess his passion, and if she met it with the old scorn and abhorrence, kill himself before her eyes. He had seen the revolver in the drawer of the desk and on the day of the performance taken it. To prevail upon her to grant him the interview was the problem, and the evil inspiration came to him to tell her he had news of Dallas, her lover. It was a lie; he knew nothing of the man, but truth, decency, self-respect no longer existed for him.

He described the interview in the living-room, her roused interest and demand for the information. The intrusion of his wife worked with his plan and he had insisted on a rendezvous where they would be free from interruption. They started for the summer house on the Point, saw Shine there, and made the arrangement to meet in the place at seven. Then she had gone upstairs to her room and he to the balcony to wait for her.

When he saw her pass the balcony he had risen and followed her. She had moved rapidly, not waiting for him, and he had not tried to catch up with her as he knew she did not want anyone to see them together. When he entered the summer house she was sitting on the bench close to the table, on which her elbows rested. His hysterical state, accelerated during the long wait, had reached a climax of distraction and he burst into a stream of words—he had lied to her, he knew nothing, but he had to see her, he had lured her there for a last interview, a final clearing up, and he drew out the pistol. The sight of it, his mad babble of disconnected sentences, evidently terrified her. She leaped to her feet and made a rush like a frightened animal for the opening. Before he could speak or catch her she had brushed past him and fled from the place.

Then something had gone wrong in his head—he couldn't explain—a breaking of some pressure, a stoppage of all mental processes. In the vacuum one fact stayed—that she had got away from him and he never would see her again. A blind fury seized him and he shot at her as she ran. She was at the summit of the cliff, staggered, threw up her arms and went over. When he saw her body lurch and topple forward the darkness lifted from his brain. He came back to himself as if from a period of unconsciousness and realized what he had done.

He described his state as curiously lucid and far-seeing. The insane outbreak seemed to have freed his intelligence and temporarily suspended the torment of his nerves. The situation presented itself with a vision-like clarity and all the forces of his mind and will sprang into action, combining to achieve his safety. From the shadow of the vines he looked at the house, saw Bassett come to the living-room entrance, glance about and go back. The sound of the shot had evidently roused no forebodings and when no face appeared at window or door, he ran to the pine grove. There he was safe and slipped unobserved to the balcony. He waited here for a moment to get his breath and compose his manner. He was the actor, playing a difficult part with a high-keyed, heady confidence when he entered the room.

His wife—that had been the unforeseen retribution. He had not realized that suspicion would turn on her, and then saw that it might, saw that it did. His hell began when he grasped the danger she was in, listened to Rawson's questions on the night of their arrival, sensed Williams' line of thought when the scene was rehearsed on the shore. He had tried to turn them to Joe Tracy, snatching at anything to gain time, but he would have told, he was ready to tell. He kept reiterating the words, his burning eyes moving from one face to the other—he had broken her heart, ruined her life, but he was not so utterly lost as that.

Unlucky Number Not Inimical to Wagner

The number 13 played a curious trick in the life of Richard Wagner. He was born in 1813. The numerals of the year of his birth added together make 13, and he was given a name (Richard) the letters of which added to those of his family name (Wagner) also make 13.

He finished "The Flying Dutchman" on September 13, 1841, and completed "Tannhauser" on April 13, 1844. The scoring of "Das Rheingold" was finished on May 13, 1854, and that of "Parsifal" on January 13, 1882. He was exiled from Germany for 13 years, and his long-cherished plan of giving his own operas in Paris was carried out with a production of "Tannhauser" on March 13, 1861.

The first performance of "The Ring" complete, at Bayreuth, was given August 13, 1876. He composed 13 complete operas, and, curiously enough, his death took place on February 13, 1883.

Boy Helped Engineers

Theodore G. Hulett, who supervised the construction of the first suspension bridge across Niagara, relates that a premium of $10 was offered to the first boy who should successfully fly over the gorge his kite string and fasten its ends to a tree on either side. A boy named Homan Walsh, a resident of Lincoln, Neb., was successful. The following day a stronger line was drawn over by the kite string and then a rope of sufficient strength to haul over the iron cable. By means of this rope the iron cable was carried across and its ends secured to the solid rock. It crossed the gorge five miles above Lewiston.

Wadena—A blowout in the front tire sent the machine of Harvey Hamm, 20 years old, hurtling into a ditch with Hamm pinned underneath. Hamm's chest was crushed and he died a few minutes later.

Feed Supply for Stock

There are few classes of live stock that can pay returns for purchased feeds. This is particularly true if the purchased feeds are roughages or feeds that can be readily grown in the community. The late summer months reveal the probable supplies of feed for the coming winter. A little thought may indicate ways in which adequate supplies of rough feeds can be assured for all classes of live stock that are to be wintered.

The cause of the war was due to gaseous trails left in the earth's atmosphere by Halley's comet in 1910, declared a speaker at a meeting in Washington. IS A HEALTHIER STRONGER GIRL

Because She Took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

The fertile valleys of Oregon help to supply the tables of America. This is possible through the magic of the humble tin can.

In one of the canning establishments, Julia Schmidt was employed. It was complicated work because she did sealing and other parts of the work. It was strenuous work and she was not a strong girl. Often she forced herself to work when she was hardly able to sit at her machine. At times she would have to stay at home for she was so weak she could hardly walk. For five years she was in this weakened condition.

She tried various medicines. At last, a friend of hers spoke of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and she gave it a trial.

"Everyone says I am a healthier and stronger girl," she writes. "I am recommending the Vegetable Compound to all my friends who tell me how they suffer and I am willing to answer letters from women asking about it." Julia Schmidt's address is 113 Willow St., Silverton, Oregon.

Girls who work in factories know just how Miss Schmidt felt. Perhaps they, too, will find better health by taking the Vegetable Compound.

THE SINS OF THE DAD-IN-LAW

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

FROM Jane Crenshaw's home in the mountains Hal Pickens drove toward the lowlands. The mountain girl he had loved long before he was old enough to understand what separated her social stratum from his had just refused to marry him for no better reason than that she did not relish being patronized by Pickenses who used the mountains only as a fishing and hunting base.

The argument Jane had used against marrying him echoed now through his brain like the clang of a funeral bell. The status that her people had given her the girl had declared to be unchanged by her normal school education. She had reminded Hal that her father, an unlettered mountaineer, had once served a sentence for counterfeiting, and though she believed him to be a law-abiding citizen now the stigma remained. Jane had further pointed out that now her father was under a cloud of suspicion. She knew evidence indicated that spurious coin was being made in her section of the mountains, and there were many who believed her father the culprit.

"I can't have your father point a finger of scorn to your wife," she had said when Hal was leaving. "Even without the immediate suspicion he would not like a Crenshaw for a daughter-in-law."

Oh, why hadn't he made her see that family amounted to no more than a snap of his strong fingers? There had been a day when Pickens wealth set the family apart from their neighbors, but now Hal remembered with a sort of joy in the challenge that almost nothing was left to his proud old father but a knowledge of law he had never been able to turn into money, the camp for which there was no purchaser, and his exaggerated sense of family importance.

Hal loved the mountaineers who surrounded the camp. He believed in Jane's father. In some way the fellow who was making bogus money in Crenshaw's neighborhood must be found and the suspicion lifted from the father of the girl he loved. Remembering that the old sheriff was rendered inactive by a protracted illness, Hal stepped on the accelerator in a frenzy of despair. With the quickened flow of gasoline an idea leaped into the boy's consciousness.

Half an hour later Hal sat by the old sheriff's side arguing valiantly.

"You can have the job back on a moment's notice," he urged. "The judge has promised to appoint me if you resign and to reappoint you when I resign. What about it?"

The sick man looked weakly at the energetic Harold and agreed.

Then the young man bucked up against his next obstacle and instead of overcoming it jumped it indecorously. He could not qualify as sheriff because the county clerk was off on a vacation, and the deputy called away by a death. Hal gave the rickety old desk a thump with the toe of his brogan. By Jove! He'd go to work unqualifiedly. Who'd know the difference?

At this juncture, however, Hal's temperamental male parent stormed into the courthouse. "A son of mine a cop, a policeman, a sheriff!" he exploded. "I forbid, I say, sir, I forbid your doing anything of the kind!"

"No use, for tonight I picket the three roads that lead to the mountains," the young man said agreeably as he turned to leave.

On the street a bit later Hal encountered Jane looking more a college poster than a hillwoman. In a burst of enthusiasm he told of his plan.

"Oh, I wish you wouldn't," she urged. "It's dangerous work."

During a tiresome vigil that night Hal and his two deputies unearthed no clews, and the next morning news came of a package of counterfeit money which, together with a noncommital youth who was carrying it, had been approached by officers at the county line. The new sheriff was stunned. The only road by which a vehicle could have come was forty miles farther. In some way the counterfeiters must have got wind of his plan. Was it possible that Jane could have given a warning?

When toward evening he found himself in the neighborhood of his father's hunting camp he was thoroughly discouraged. Taking a bypath that led toward the camp he was amazed to see Jane Crenshaw coming toward him. The fear returned that Jane had warned the band. After all, could one expect her not to be loyal to her people?

"Oh, Hal," she gasped in distress, "you are so tired."

The boy nodded and passed on. On the veranda he saw his father in hunting togs cleaning a rusty gun. Then throwing himself on the first cot he saw, in five minutes Hal slept.

Toward morning he woke refreshed and eager to do a little prowling before sunrise. Stealthily he crept through the underbrush toward the byroad that connected the two mountain highways. Suddenly the sound of subdued voices reached him, and in a minute he thought he discerned two figures. Then the shadowy forms seemed to be swallowed up by the earth. Crawling like a cat, Hal ex[illegible] the spot where he had seen [illegible]. Beneath his fingers the earth felt as though it had been recently disturbed. Then his hand touched the hard surface of a rock, which he realized must have been moved from its place against the hillside. Groping forward, he saw that there was an aperture in the hillside, from which the rock had been temporarily rolled. Flashlight in one hand and pistol in the other, he entered the cavern. As he pressed on, the stillness was broken by the sound of metallic hammering and the darkness was relieved by the glimmering of a torch. He could see a man bending over something that resembled a mold. He seemed to be taking the thing apart. Outside the circle of light some one else was standing.

"Hands up!" Hal commanded.

The man bending over the mold turned, and Hal stood face to face—with his father. The boy dropped both flashlight and pistol to his side, appalled by the discovery. Then, he managed to say, "I'm sorry, father, but you're under arrest."

"Tut, tut, my son, a gentleman must have money. I started this for my own use, but finding others needing the product, I increased the output."

Then the voice of Jane Crenshaw intervened. "You couldn't arrest your own father," it pleaded.

"I'm a better lawyer than my son," the elder Pickens interrupted. "One private citizen cannot arrest another. You were not able to qualify on account of the absence of the county clerk."

Hal was about to leave when he felt on his arm Jane's detaining hand.

"You weren't quick enough, my boy. Jane discovered this plant day before yesterday and persuaded me to dismantle it to save you embarrassment. Having disposed of the coin, we were about to pile the molds on the open road for you and your men to capture. Go along Jane. Bill will be back with the car any moment now."

When Hal and Jane emerged from the tunnel there was in the east the first glow of the rising sun. It was Jane who broke the silence.

"I wish it were my father instead of yours. I love you so!" She choked.

"Then you will marry me?" Hal whispered. "It didn't take this to convince me that Pickenses were not better than Crenshaws. It's individuals that count—not ancestors."

"Yes," Jane replied softly, "people like you and me with love, hope, ambition—and each other."

Perfect Examples of Art of Condensation

As the story goes, Victor Hugo, upon the publication of "Les Miserables," felt that too much curiosity as to the results would be out of keeping with his standing and dignity. Yet he was naturally rather anxious after the tremendous labor he had expended upon this mighty work. So he compromised by sending his publisher his card on which he placed simply the question-mark: "?" To which the publisher, equally laconic and not less forceful, and being able to promise great things for the novel, replied with "!"

Another noted French author, Merimee, was in Paris on a certain occasion when the court had moved to Compiegne. He was anxious to know what of interest, if anything, was going on there; and being greatly disinclined to lengthy correspondence, he sent his friend, Octave Feuillet, a sheet of paper bare of writing save a simple interrogation mark, to which Feuillet, having nothing of consequence to narrate, very sufficiently replied with a blank sheet.

Voltaire was nothing if not direct, and one day, anticipating a call from the satirist Piron, whom he greatly disliked, chalked outside his door, "Eo Rus!" ("Gone to farm!") Piron, contemplating this and quite understanding its significance, inscribed underneath the single word, "II" ("Go!").

Planes in Locust Battle

Airplanes will be used this year in the campaign against the locust plague in the southern part of the Island of Luzon, in the Philippines. The winged pests have done great damage there in previous summers, and efforts to exterminate them have met with little success, but it is believed by the farm bureau that the spreading of chemicals by the planes flying over the fields will be much more decisive and systematic. Two planes of the bureau have been specially equipped for the work and sent from Manila to Bohol province, where the campaign will be concentrated. Pilots from the Department of Agriculture have been trained in the work.

Goldfish Live Twenty Years

Any life insurance underwriter who was sufficiently enterprising would quote a first-class goldfish's life at from fifteen to twenty years, providing the environment is suitable and if it is regularly fed on ants' eggs and crushed vermicelli and not on crumbs of black beetles, according to aquarium authorities.

The carp family, to which the goldfish belongs, is famous for longevity. There are carp in the ponds of the Chateau de Chantilly in France which belonged to the prince de Conde and which are supposed to be centuries old.

New Section of Montana Is Open to Settlement

More than 1,000,000 acres of rich Montana land in the great Redwater Valley will be opened up and provided with new transportation this year by a branch line of the Northern Pacific Railway now being built from Glendive to Brookway.

This territory has long been known to possess rich, well-sodded soil adapted to the production of specialty or diversified crops. In the immediate vicinity a new type of corn has proved so successful that the acreage of this crop in Montana has increased by hundreds of thousands of acres in recent years. Corn has paved the way for livestock production, dairying and a variety of crops including oats, flax, barley, alfalfa, sweet clover and garden truck.

Wheat produced here averages 14% protein content and has graded consistently 72% number 1 quality, a classification which has determined top prices on every market. The yearly production of wheat is increasing in this region as well as in the state as a whole. Montana last year produced 11,000,000 bushels more of wheat than in 1925.

The area now served by the new branch line, although considered the greatest potential farm area in the Northwest, has never been developed to the extent its fertility merits.

Already several important groups are preparing to move in. Communities are established in some of the sections already. Churches have been built. Schools are open and well attended.

"The Northern Pacific will do everything in its power to assist the new settlers," says J. M. Hughes, Land Commissioner. "It is prepared to advise and assist in the selection of seed and equipment—in the selection of soil and location for the kind of farming desired. We want the right kind of farmers—settlers, not speculators. Farmers who will build homes, help develop the country, and share in the rich future which we believe is inevitable for Montana, will be favored in our settlement program."

WAYS TO BLOCK CROOKED PROMOTERS

By W. R. MOREHOUSE

Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association

(This is one of a series of articles exposing the wiles of sharpers who are after your money.)

W R. MOREHOUSE

MANY reliable corporations, firms and individuals are engaged in developing mining properties, drilling for possible new oil wells and promoting new inventions and enterprises. On the other hand many unreliable persons are ostensibly engaged in the same pursuits, but in reality are only promoting frauds. Therefore, every investor should first divide the sheep from the goats before he hazards his savings. Because there are many dishonest manipulators using mining, oil, invention and promotion terms to deceive does not mean that all promoters in these fields are crooked. The truth is, there are many trustworthy men engaged in promoting enterprises that are honest investments. The problem is to know the difference between promoters of the reliable type and the high-pressure variety. The former are engaged in legitimate business. The other group is engaged in fleecing the public.

The number of those who deliberately scheme to defraud is large and they are shrewd and deceitful. For this reason those who cannot afford to lose their savings should not trust entirely to their own judgment in making investments.

In order to divide the sheep from the goats—to distinguish between reliable and unreliable promoters, to tell the good investments from the worthless—the inexperienced investor should consult his banker or let the National Better Business Bureau, whose headquarters are in New York City, advise him. It costs nothing to get such advice from either source. It is safe to say that if those who have lost their savings through fraudulent schemes had followed this simple course they would still be in possession of their money.

Get the Facts

Invariably, get the facts and there is no substitute. There is nothing better and nothing just as good as the facts when it comes to withdrawing your savings from the bank and investing them. The facts about an investment either strengthen its position or show it up to be risky—oftentimes too risky for the person who cannot afford to lose others you know nothing about. Sometime you may be approached to make a trade by a plausible person claiming to have better investments to offer than those you have. Recently a woman owning a block of gilt-edge public utility stock was approached by two smooth sharpers and urged to exchange it for stock in a fruit company which, she was told, was not only very valuable then but would increase rapidly in value and soon make her independently wealthy. Fortunately she told her neighbor about her offer. It happened that the neighbor had recently been defrauded in a similar way. She advised the second woman to report her offer to the local better business bureau. Having handled many similar situations the bureau instructed the woman to make an appointment for the traders to meet her in her home.

Good Advice that Prevented Disaster.

New schemes to defraud are being hatched daily. The unscrupulous promoter never sleeps but is continuously plotting new methods of attack on the savers' hard-won accumulations. The liberties he takes with the law and the schemes he designs for belittling the sound advice of responsible persons makes it even more essential for investors to get the facts.

Remember that anything that is worth investing in is worth knowing about as to its safety, its income, and its marketability. Any investment which is enshrouded by a screen of glowing promises or is so complicated that neither you nor your banker can fathom it and get the hard facts isn't an investment you can afford to put your money into.

Make it an unbreakable rule to get all the facts, whether the investment be large or small, and you will save yourself the heartaches and bitter disappointment of losing your savings.

Millions of dollars which have unfortunately been lost through poor investment might have been saved if the investors had taken time to investigate before investing. There is always need for capital in safe, honest business and so great is the legitimate demand for investors' funds that not one cent need be wasted by them on fraudulent schemes.

Don't Trade Good for Bad

Don't exchange your investments for

They were on hand at the appointed hour. With the cunning of expert swindlers they proceeded to inveigle her stock away from her, assuring her that if she exchanged her public utility stock for that of the fruit company there was no doubt she would become very rich. But just as they were spreading out before her a beautifully embossed stock certificate the bureau's detective stepped out from his place of concealment and told the swindlers he had come prepared to take them for a ride in his car. They protested loudly and even struck at him, but experienced as he was in handling persons who resist arrest he soon had them handcuffed together.

Investigation revealed that the certificate of stock of the fruit company was fictitious. No such company had ever been organized. The evidence also disclosed that some certificates had already been issued and exchanged and there were a large number more ready for future use whenever a trade could be arranged.

Literally thousands of inexperienced investors are being swindled out of their good investments in such trades. It behooves all persons who have good investments not to exchange them without first getting all the facts from their banker or other person fully qualified to advise and protect them.

Blueberry Crop to Break Record

100,000 Pickers Needed to Harvest This Year's Crop.

If one per cent of the blueberry crop in this district is to be harvested this summer it will take a thousand pickers to do it. The whole Lake of the Woods district is just one mass of the lucious fruit, and only a small per centage of it can be picked according to old timers who have been in the district for years.

The Baudette blueberry cannery will probably take care of 12 or 14 carloads, and buyers of fresh blueberries will handle close to the same amount, but the bigger part of the crop will not even be picked. There are thousands of acres on the shores of the Lake of the Woods just turning blue and in another ten days will be ready for picking.

ST. HILAIRE WINS

The Gatzke baseball team had invited the St. Hilaire team up there last Sunday for a game and news of this spead around so quite a crowd motored up to the country village to see the game. It was a very good game, no one got around the diamond until the sixth inning when St. Hilaire made two runs on errors. After this was over the game went on again for three innings without any one making a score.

It was a sociable game to all and ended peacefully with a 2 to 0 victory for St. Hilaire.

HOW A FARMING COMMUNITY WAS REBUILT AGAIN

Glass factories and coal mines had kept the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker and the banker busy the year round in Point Marion, Pennsylvania. Hired men left the farms followed by the farm owners to get their share of the attractive wages.

Suddenly labor saving machinery was brought in to the old hand method window glass factories. The coal business took a drop and hundreds of people had to find new employment. Savings accounts dwindled. Deposits of the two banks dropped off almost a million dollars.

"Bring in more industries," was being sung at luncheon clubs all over the land, every town seemed to be advertising unlimited water supply, cheap fuel and free factory sites. Competition was keen and the reward doubtful.

The question came, "Why not stimulate the agricultural pursuits of the community which have lain dormant so long." Farm income might be increased and production costs lowered in many instances.

The first move of one of the banks was the purchase of healthy chicks. These were furnished by the bank at wholesale to interested farmers, payment to be made b ynote payable in six months. The bank followed through by aiding in the dissemination of culling and feeding knowledge and by helping to market the cockerels which in most instances paid the initial cost of all the chicks.

When the pumpkins began to turn yellow, plans were laid for a great community exhibit. Besides the poultry display, farm produce exhibits from the surrounding country were entered. Altogether it made an impressive exhibit, bringing home the lesson to Point Marion people that there were great undeveloped opportunities within their own dooryards which they had overlooked.

The annual exhibit will be continued in the future by the bank. A horse show is sponsored, better seed corn and seed potatoes ar emade available to the farmers for planting and the bank will continue to build agriculture in the community as a sound basis on which to work. "It will probably be some time before we shall see larger fruits of our endeavors," the banker says, "but we are looking ahead ten to fifteen years."

Baseball Fiasco Staged Sunday

Locals Find Silver Creek Is Still Tarnished.

The Holt Cooperative Baseball Team motored to Silver Creek on Sunday, where they engaged in a seven-inning war with that aggregation. There was only one score-keeper on hand, who kept score for Silver Creek, and once in a while he marked down a score for Holt. Along about the seventh inning, when Holt had crossed the home plate nine times that they knew of, one of our players inquired about the score, and was told that it was 8—5, in favor of Silver Creek. To the local team all did not smell fresh in Denmark when they heard what the score was, so they packed up, beat it for home, and left the Silver Creek team on the diamond looking like a bunch of lost sheep.

It appears that the locals always have a hard time playing a straight game with the Silver creek bunch. We did not see the game on Sunday, so we go only by what we were told in regards to this punk game which they had out there in the bushes.

This coming Sunday Holt will play Radium at 2 p. m. and Rollis at 6 p. m., at the home diamond. Good time assured.

Clarence Nelson of Clearbrook visited at the P. Olson home the forepart of this week.

—18—

It was her assurances that quieted him. She had known from the first he would tell as she had known from the first he had done it. He relaxed and sank back, his eyes closing, and the doctor motioned them to go. Flora followed them to the door and held them there a moment to repeat what she had said—as if, like him, wanting to rid her mind of all its secret agony. It wasn't surmise; she had seen him. When she had turned from the water after her attempt to catch the body she had had a clear view of him stealing through the pine wood, moving noiselessly and watching the house.

"He never knew it," she said. "That night when you, Mr. Williams, nearly caught me on the stairs, I was going to see him, say I knew what he'd done and that I'd help him and lie for him and stand by him. Oh, yes—I don't care what I tell now. He was my husband, I'd loved him and he'd been cursed—cursed and destroyed."

The men closed the door softly as upon the dead. What they had heard and left behind them had taken the zest from their accomplishment and in the glow of the hall lights their faces looked drawn and hollowed with fatigue. Rawson drew out his watch—half past two. The best thing they could do was to get a little sleep, and stepping gently, as befitted a place where so dark a doom had fallen, he and Williams passed into the library.

Sleep was far from Bassett. He would like to have seen Anne, but it would have been inhuman to rouse her, and he went toward the living room where he could think in quiet. He dropped into a chair, his breath expelled with a groaning note, then heard Anne's voice from the gallery above:

"I've been waiting for you. May I come down?"

There she was, dressed, leaning against the railing.

"Come," he beckoned, his heart expanding, his depression lightened, and as she disappeared he pulled up a chair for her. She came in, soft-footed across the rugs, with the whispering words:

"I couldn't rest till I'd seen you and heard. He's told?"

"Everything." They sat, facing each other, close together. "It's solved and ended—the Gull Island murder."

"Is it all right for you to tell me?"

It was all right and he told her.

"So, as it turns out, Anne dearest, all that misery you and I went through was unnecessary."

"Yes," she said slowly. "It wasn't Joe, he wasn't in it at all. But I don't understand. I've been sitting in my room while you were with Stokes thinking about it and I can't make it out. Hugh"—she leaned forward and rested her hand on his knee, dropping her voice though no one was there to hear—"this is what I can't explain—who did I see in here last night?"

Bassett's answer was prompt, delivered in the brisk tone of common sense:

"I can. It's very simple. You didn't see anybody."

"You think I imagined it?"

"I know you did. Just consider: You were in a wrought-up condition, you expected to see him, came down for that purpose. The room was almost dark, quiet dark under the gallery where you say he came from. After what you'd gone through—first a murder, then a suspicion that would have undermined the strongest nerves—you were in a state to see anything."

She continued to stare at the light, her face set in troubled thought.

"I suppose that could be."

"Why, Anne dear, it must have been, it could have happened to anyone. And there's another point—if it had been Joe, wouldn't he have spoken to you, one question even to find out what was going on, what we were doing?"

"Yes, yes. I've thought of that. It didn't occur to me at the time. But he would have said something."

"Of course he would. You never saw anything more substantial than a shadow in the moonlight."

She was silent for a moment then said:

"Well, where is Joe? What's he doing?"

"Gone off on some business of his own. You were telling the truth when you told Rawson and Williams that Joe's actions weren't always calculable, weren't you?" He saw her answering nod. "Well, he's evidently chosen the occasion of his leaving the island to light out in some new direction. You can't tell what may have been in his head—a joke on Jimmy Travers, on us, any sort of lark or tomfoolery. We'll find it all out soon."

"Come," he said, rising and drawing her to her feet. "There's no good bothering about that any more. Leave it to [illegible] when we've got through the rest of this horrible business I'll look around for him. And anyway, he'll see it in the papers, and if he wants to show up, he'll do it himself within the next few days. Now you must go to bed and let your poor tired brain rest."

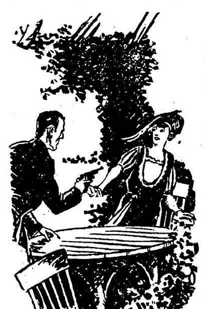
They walked to the door and there he caught her against his breast and looked into her face:

"It's all over—that fighting and struggling alone, Anne. After this we'll be together, as soon as we can get away from here and find a clergyman to marry us."

They kissed and parted, Bassett going to his room—he could sleep now—and Anne faring slowly up the stairs to hers.

CHAPTER XIV

Anyone watching Gull Island from the shore would have seen the yellow shape of one bright window set like a small golden square in the darkness. The bright window was Anne's and over against it Anne sat on the side of the bed looking at the floor. She sat perfectly still, held in a staring concentration of thought, reviewing the happenings of the night.



Panic Had Seized Him and He Had Made a Rush From the Place.

While Bassett had talked to her she had accepted his theory. His belief in it had been so absolute and it was so plausible. Of course a person in her state might have imagined anything. And as she dwelt on the sentence to persuade herself, the vision of the dim shadowy room rose before her with the figure coming toward her from the darkness of the gallery, moving spiritlike as an hallucination might move. But as the memory grew in vividness the shape took form and solidity, the slim boy's shape. She saw again its rapid advance, its sudden stoppage at her words, its lightning-quick turn and soundless flight. The snap of the closing door came to her mind as a last confirmation and she knew it was no delusion.

"I did," she said in a whisper, and raised her eyes as if confronting a doubter with the truth. "I knew it—I did see somebody."

Somebody!

The word struck her ear with a startling effect, an effect of discovery, of impending disclosures. Her body shrank together as if in fear of them, her riveted glance grew fixed as a sleep-walker's. She lost all sense of her surroundings, her entire being contracted to a point of inner activity. Before that intensified mental vision a series of pictures passed like the slides in a magic lantern—Shine's photograph, the worn, wide-eyed face of Sybil; Joe playing Sebastian, his costume, his movements, a replica of Viola's; the living room as they heard the shot, dusk falling outside; in the summer house—with its shrouding vines—it would have been almost dark.

Suddenly a recollection flashed up, clairvoyantly distinct—Joe at the flat trying to make Bassett give him the part of Sebastian, imitating Sybil's walk. That picture brought her to her feet, brought a smothered cry to her lips. The spots of light had joined, run together in a leaping illumination.

On the bureau lay the key of Joe's trunk that she had brought from his room after their last interview. She snatched it up and ran to the door, out of it, along the gallery. In Joe's room she turned on the light and unlocked his trunk. She went through it to the bottom looking for his Sebastian costume. It was gone, every appointment of it. She had not needed the proof, she knew that she would not find it, that it was Joe, dressed in that costume, Stokes had killed.

The rest of it—Sybil alive, hiding somewhere! She saw the gray dawn on the window—the night was over, the house would soon be stirring. She locked the trunk, turned off the light and stole out on the gallery. She did not go back to her room but kept on down the hall to the top floor staircase. Half way up she heard from the floor above a sound, so faint, so furtive, that it would only have been audible in the dead dawn hush. She made a rush upward sending her voice, low-keyed but passionately urgent, ahead of her:

"Sybil, Sybil, if it's you, wait. It's Anne. I'm coming to help you."

The door of the bedroom opposite the stair-head was open. Against the pale light of the window, poised with one hand resting on the raised sash, was a boy's figure—surely the figure she had seen in the living room two nights before. It was so completely boyish, the cropped round head, the knickerbockers and belted jacket, that she could not yet be sure and went forward with slackened gait, peering and murmuring fearfully:

"Sybil, it is you?"

The figure left the window, came nearer, silently, creepingly, with a hand raised for caution. She saw the face then, pinched and haggard, strangely altered with the curling frame of hair clipped close, but still Sybil's.

It was so extraordinary—such a gulf of unknown happenings lay between them—that at first they said nothing. Anne spoke first.

"Joe," she said. "It's Joe that's dead."

"Yes. Do they know?"

"They know nothing. They think it was you. It's all over, Stokes has told. But, oh, what is it? I can't understand—it's like a fearful dream."

The words died away and a sudden violent trembling shook her. With the joints of her knees like water she sank on the side of the bed, gripping the other with her shaking hands, pulling her down beside her.

"Tell me, tell me," she implored. "Why is he dead? Why did he pretend he was you? What was he doing?"

They sat, clinging together, two small huddled figures in the gray light. Though the house below was as silent as the tomb they spoke in subdued voices, question, answer, surmise. Each knew a different aspect of the story, brought her own knowledge of Joe's motives and actions. In that whispered exchange they pieced together the separate facts, combined them in coherent sequence and came to a final enlightenment.

Joe had met his death in his last effort as a police spy, his last effort to get the Parkinson reward. Leaving his room to come down and make ready for his departure, he had heard the voices of Stokes and Sybil in the living room. Sybil remembered Stokes' upward look and question about someone moving in the gallery—Joe creeping to concealment behind the arch. The nature of their conversation would have held him listening: here was his last opportunity to get the information he sought. He had heard the rendezvous in the summer house. Its open situation offered no hiding place outside, but knowing that it would be almost dark inside, he had conceived the idea of putting on his Sebastian costume and impersonating Sybil.

His room was next to Sybil's. He had heard her come upstairs and from his window could command the Point. When Shine left it he had gone down, passed the balcony where Stokes was waiting, and hearing his following footsteps, moved with that close imitation of Sybil's gait to the summer house. There the dim light and the drooping curls of his wig enabled him to carry through the deception. Stokes' wild speech, followed by the drawing of the pistol, had terrified him. Confronted by a man armed and half mad, panic had seized him and he had made a rush from the place.

Visit to Birthplace Upset "Divine Sarah"

It is generally believed, and the Encyclopedia Britannica records, that Sarah Bernhardt, the noted actress, was born in Paris and that her parents were a mixture of French and Dutch and of Jewish descent, but the most recent version of her origin says she was born in Amsterdam, Holland, of Jew parents. The authority for this version is Lyon van Lyer of Amsterdam, who revealed the purported true story of the actress' birth at a dinner in Amsterdam not long after Sarah Bernhardt's death. He claimed that her father was his brother. Van Lyer related that once when the Divine Sarah visited Amsterdam, she sought him and asked to be shown the place where she was born. It was a squalid, underground room, and when they arrived, a blind, decrepit beggar lay on a bed of rags in one corner. The actress collapsed on a rickety chair and burst into tears. Suddenly she leaped up, flung a 1,000-franc note on the table in the center of the room and fled up the steps and out into the street.—New York Evening Post.

Duluth—Intensive investigation in co-operation with the state board of health of the causes of the high death rate among mothers resulting from child birth was authorized by the Minnesota State Medical association at its fifty-ninth annual meeting here.

Faribault—Thousands of townspeople and visitors lined the city's streets under a scorching sun to view the pageant of color and fragrance in the parade which opened Faribault's first annual peony festival staged under the auspices of the Northwest Peony and Iris society.

St. Paul—To nearly 28,000 boys and girls of Minnesota, summer vacation does not mean fishing trips and months of idleness. Nearly 28,000 members of boys' and girls' clubs in every county of the state have started working in gardens or raising stock, and they intend to make an all summer job of it.

Minneapolis—Excellent crop prospects, even finer than those of a week ago as result of a spell of ideal growing weather and lending new assurance of a bountiful grain harvest, prevail in all corners of the inland northwest. This statement is based on reports compiled by three leading railroads serving the territory.

Elk River—With a dead man's hands clutched firmly on the steering wheel and his foot pressed tightly against the accelerator, an automobile sped up to 55 miles an hour on Jefferson highway four miles south of Elk River, then crashed into a ditch and overturned, seriously injuring another occupant of the car. A. Radcliffe, Cannon Falls, was riding with Peter to Minneapolis. Mr. Miller was driving.

42 years before the eyes of an ever-diminishing group of Civil war soldiers, a bottle of wine will be tenderly uncorked and sipped here July 21 by three old men, who probably will see in the sparkling glass visions of that long day on which they marched away on the trail of "Johnny Reb." It will be the last—the very last—meeting of the now famous Last Man's club of the old First Minnesota, B company.

St. Paul—Packing of early June peas in Minnesota canneries has been started and a good output is predicted by N. J. Holmberg, commissioner of the state department of agriculture. The yield this year is approximately the same as that of a year ago, but the quality of the peas this season is reported to be "much better" than in 1926, according to Mr. Holmberg. Last year's output totaled 455,000 cases of 24 cans each.

St. Paul—More than 1,000 farmers and farm organization leaders of Minnesota, the Dakotas, Montana, Iowa and Wisconsin are expected to attend the northwest agricultural conference at the St. Paul auditorium, sponsored by the Minnesota Council of Agriculture and the Minnesota Farm Bureau federation and to be featured by addresses by agricultural authorities and members of congress who have championed the cause of legislative farm relief.

Minneapolis—October 4-8 are the dates chosen for the Institute of Government and Politics to be held in Minneapolis under the joint auspices of the University of Minnesota and the Minnesota League of Women Voters. The state League convention will be held at the same time but the greater part of the week will be devoted to the program of the Institute. Similar institutes were held in St. Paul in 1923 and 1925 and proved of great interest to women in the state who attended.

St. Paul—Six Minnesota trunk highways have been selected by the state highway department for designation as "arterials" and will be protected by "stop" signs which will be set up shortly. The six roads are carriers of unusually heavy traffic. The highways which will be marked as arterials are: No. 1—From Duluth, through St. Paul to Owatonna. No. 3—From Minneapolis to Sauk Center. No. 5—From Minneapolis through Columbia Heights. No. 12—From Minneapolis through Excelsior. No. 27—From St. St. Cloud to Brainerd. No. 50—From Minneapolis to Farmington.

Anoka—A 17-year-old Anoka angler landed what is believed to be the northwest's record muskellunge of the season when, after a two hour tussle, Phil Johnson conquered a scrappy "musky" weighing 32 pounds and 10 ounces in the Rum river here.

Bemidji—The state fisheries at Redby, operated since June 1 as a relief measure for Red Lake Chippewa fishermen, was operated during June at a loss of approximately $700 to the state fisheries department, according to George Weaver, superintendent of Minnesota commercial fishing.

This Cat Enjoys Ants as Well as Mice Diet

Rainier, Wash.—A house cat that preys on ants as well as mice is the pet in the household of James McIntire. The cat has been observed repeatedly sitting by large red ant hills. It places both paws on the hill one on either side of the burrow opening through which the insects pass. Disturbed ants rush out guided by the narrow hairy lane up to tabby's mouth. Those ants accumulating on his paws the cat wipes off with a few licks of the spiny tongue. Several ant hills each day is this cat's insect toll.

TRAVELS FAR TO MAKE UNION SAFE

Wants to Be Married in City Where Freed.

Sioux Falls, S. D.—Because his first wife came to Sioux Falls 28 years ago, during the days when the South Dakota metropolis was the divorce mecca for mismated couples from all parts of the world, and obtained a divorce from him, Roland Pope, sixty-three, thought it no more than proper that he should come to Sioux Falls from his home in Sydney, Australia, and marry a new bride.

The woman who traveled half way around the world with him in order to become his second wife was before her marriage to Pope Amy Carleton Keigwin, sixty, also of Sydney. They have just been married here by Rev. A. C. Preston, pastor of the First Presbyterian church. Following a marriage luncheon they departed for England to spend their honeymoon.

The aged bride and groom were accompanied to Sioux Falls by a Mr. Jamieson of Australia and a Mrs. Morgan of Singapore, Straits Settlements, who served as attendants to the wedding party. They also acted as witnesses to the wedding and after the business which called him to Sioux Falls had been concluded they accompanied the bride and groom on their journey to England.

The courts of Australia do not recognize divorces granted in South Dakota, and accordingly Mr. Pope, who is understood to be a man of wealth, decided that to be on the safe side it was no more than proper that he should marry his second wife in the state which had granted a divorce from the first, and thus protect his property interests, so there could be no dispute as to the right of his second wife to inherit his estate should he be the first of the two to die.

Under the South Dakota marriage laws they had no difficulty in obtaining the necessary marriage license, and armed with this they lost no time in proceeding to the home of the clergyman who united them in marriage and thus brought to a conclusion a romance extending over many years.

The Chinese press always pays great attention to all the doings of Mei Langfang, whose position is unique, and several tales are going the rounds in connection with his approaching marriage.

One story is that Mei and Miss Meng fell in love while both were acting in the same company. However, it is also declared that Mei's first wife, jealous of her successor, brought about the new situation in revenge against the second wife.

Fatal Pinochle Hand Wins Funeral Money

New York.—Eight aces, drawn in a pinochle hand, cost Frank Frankenthal, a watchman, his life, but won him the expenses of his funeral.

"I will see that Frankenthal gets the best funeral obtainable. Any man who can draw eight aces in a pinochle game deserves it," declared Irving Kemp, his employer for the last 15 years, when informed of the watchman's death.

Frankenthal, playing with three friends, was dealt two aces and drew the remaining six. As he drew his eighth ace he arose from his chair with a shout and fell back unconscious. A physician found he died of heart failure.

Expensive Smoke

New York.—A messenger boy's smoke cost $13,000. An eighteen-year-old youth, carrying a bag of securities for Newborg & Co., brokers, took it with him to lunch at a self-service restaurant. He met a messenger friend and they went out to Battery park to puff and watch the ships go by. Then they noted the bag was missing.

The New Music

Mary Garden, embarking on the Olympic, said to a New York reporter:

"A great deal of the new music is as absurd as dadaism. It is mere self-advertising bluff.

"In Paris a lady went to hear some of it—the 'Boilermakers' Symphony' or 'Steam-Hammer Sonata,' I think the piece was called.

"'Well, how did you like it?' I asked her afterward.

"'Mary,' she said, 'I was so glad to get away that I was glad I went.'"

More Eggs—Less Shell

"More eggs—thinner shells" is given as the cause of a steady increase in claims for breakages experienced by carriers of imported eggs, who have been authoritatively informed that it is due to the increased productivity of the foreign hen. A poultry expert says that the speeding up of production by foreign poultry keepers has resulted in loss of thickness in the shell.

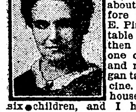
Iowa Woman Found Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Always Helpful



Vinton, Iowa.—"When I was seventeen years old I had to stay at home from school. I finally had to quit school, I was so weak. I suffered for about two years before I took Lydia E. World's Deep Debt to Finder of Astigmatism

A centenary of peculiar interest to many sufferers from defective eyesight is that of the first spectacle lens to correct astigmatism, which was made just a hundred years ago.

The maker of the lens was an Ipswich optician named Fuller, but the discovery of astigmatism, and the suggestion as to its remedy, were the work of Sir George Biddell Airy, then a Cambridge professor, and still considerably under thirty years of age.

Airy afterward became astronomer royal, a post which he held for 26 years, in which he completely re-equipped the British Royal observatory with instruments of his own design.

Thousands of astigmatic spectacle lenses are now sold every week, so that countless people must have cause to bless Airy's researches. But he was never a single penny richer for his discovery.—London Answers.

Breaking It Gently

It was the scent of summer in the air that sent a certain business man a-hurrying to his tailor.

During the winter months, however, his figure had altered. No longer was he tall and slim. Plenty of good food and long days of enforced idleness had played him a low trick.

His tailor spotted the change but, knowing his customer, kept a discreet silence as he measured skillfully.

"About the same as last year—eh?" queried the business man, as the measuring process came to an end.

"Oh, yes, sir," replied the tactful tailor. "Chest a bit lower, p'r'aps, that's all."

YIELDS PER ACRE GAIN FOR 40 YEARS

Northwest Especially Shows Crop Increase.

Washington.—Increased production of the important food and feed crops during the last 40 years is due in a considerable measure to the increase in yield per acre, according to B. O. Weitz, agricultural economist of the United States Department of Agriculture.

This acre-yield increase has been most notable in the long-settled northwestern section of the United States, where some of the land has been supposed by many to be wearing out.

Since the population is growing steadily and most of the good land suitable for cultivation has already been taken up, the problem of soil productivity and fertility in relation to the future food supply will become a more and more important phase of land utilization.

The future trend of acre yields can best be estimated on the basis of past performances, says Mr. Weitz. Since 1883 the average yield per acre of corn in the United States has increased about 18 per cent, and potatoes about 40 per cent.

During this 40-year period the combined acreage of corn, wheat, oats and potatoes has been expanded about 52 per cent, whereas the total production of these crops has increased 77 per cent.

It seems safe to assume that developments in the coming years with regard to acre yields will depend as in the past to a great extent on the prices of agricultural products.

Archeological Finds Tend to Prove Bible

Berkeley, Calif. — In discovering what is believed to be ruins of the famous old Biblical city of Mizpah in Palestine, William Frederic Bade, Berkeley scientist and professor of religion, has unearthed substantial verification of the history of the Old Testament, believes Dr. Herman Frank Swartz, president of the Pacific School of Religion.

Professor Bade, who is on leave of absence from the Berkeley religious institution, has "uncovered things of much greater historical interest than the skull of the 'bobbed-hair Venus,'" said Doctor Swartz, in disclosing that numerous boxes of prehistoric relics have been received from the excavator.

"His findings at Tel-El-Nasbeh (The Hill, Nasbeth) served to confirm, except as to details, which, of course, would be perishable, the Biblical accounts of the history in the Old Testament."

Ex-Kaiser's Chef Was Wilhelm II's Prisoner

Paris.—He cooked for the ex-kaiser after having been a prisoner of Wilhelm II's grandfather—and the ex-kaiser liked it. That is the record of G. A. Escoffier, dean of French chefs, still spry at eighty-seven.

"I have sent at least 200 cooks to America in 20 years," he recalls. "Most of them I trained outside of France, at the Savoy and Carlton in London, or aboard the Hamburg-American liners. But they were all Frenchmen and trained in the French tradition of cookery—naturally the best in the world.

"It was aboard the liner Berengaria, then the Imperator, that I first met the former emperor. They hesitated to hire me because I had been captured in the war of 1870 and had been treated—well, as prisoners are likely to be. However, I soon reassured his majesty that I had no intention of poisoning him."

British Workhouse Women Demand Bobbing of Hair

London.—Shingled hair has become so prevalent in England that even feminine inmates of workhouses demand it. This was revealed when, after a heated discussion, the Biggleswade (Bedfordshire) board of guardians voted to accept the offer of a local barber to shingle all the women in the local workhouse at the inclusive charge of $17.50 yearly.

27,650,267 Autos Now in Operation in World

Washington.—A world census of automobiles made public by the Commerce department recently indicated that on January 1, 1927, there were 27,650,267 automobiles, trucks and busses in operation all over the globe. This was an increase of 3,176,638 over January 1, 1926.

The United States had in operation 80 per cent of the total, or 22,137,334 machines. The United Kingdom was second with 1,023,651, France third with 891,000, and Canada fourth with 826,918. Other countries with large quotas were in the order named: Australia, 365,615; Germany, 319,000; Argentina, 222,610; Italy, 138,177; Spain, 135,000, and New Zealand, 123,224.

RECOUNTS THRILLS IN HUNTING MOROS

Hero of Native Police Tells of Battle With Outlaws.

Washington.—For those who must have thrills, the heart of Mindanao, a southern island of the Philippines, is recommended.

There, says Lieut. Calixto Duque of the native constabulary, the hunting of Moro outlaws could provide enough excitement to satisfy almost anybody's craving for adventure.

Duque himself faced the poisoned spears, the arrows, mantraps and razor-edged knives of the outlaws with such courage that he was rewarded with a year's visit in the United States to study military tactics at Fort Benning, Ga. He has just completed the course and is on the way back to the Philippines.

Tells of Expedition.

Telling of his experiences in Mindanao, he recalled an expedition against a band of 150 Moros accused of killing a constabulary officer, a sergeant, three privates and a civilian, whom scouts had found fortified on a hill rising from a plain and backed by a wall of mountains.

He set out with his company before sunup, carrying a long staff with which he probed the ground before him to avoid stumbling into a mantrap. To fall into such a trap would mean death on the poisoned heads of implanted spears.

When the party approached the Moro stronghold they saw an earthen wall on the hillcrest and a wide, dry moat at its base. Volunteers to scale the wall were called for and the officers, exercising their privilege under the constabulary code, crept toward the wall.

The Moros opened fire, but the constabulary replied in kind, silencing the outlaws' guns. When the latter ceased firing the officers made a rush for the wall and Duque leaped across the moat and clambered up the tangle of bamboo and creepers which formed its outer side.

Abandon Women and Children.

Reaching the top of the wall, he emptied the three cartridges of his sawed-off repeating shotgun into the inclosure. Abandoning the women and children they had with them, the outlaws dashed into a dugout, from which some escaped through an underground passage.

For a moment the twenty-four-year-old lieutenant seemed to be an undisputed conqueror. But only for a moment. A half-naked Moro arose like a shadow near him, spear poised, its deadly tip glistening in the hot sun. Duque's comrades opened fire, but the Moro appeared immune to their bullets and the conqueror raised the stock of his empty gun to parry the spear thrust.

It wasn't necessary to swing the gun, however, for a bullet which had been sapping the life of the outlaw suddenly proved too much for him and he pitched headforemost into the redoubt.

Evelyn, 220 Years Ago, Had Recipe for Salad

London.—Salad was "sallet" when first it entered English homes more than two centuries ago. But it really wasn't much different from salads of today, although cooks of various lands prefer their own preparations.

John Evelyn laid down the law of the salad exactly 220 years ago. An excerpt from the records of this famous diarist reads:

"Sallett is a particular combination of certain crude and fresh herbs, such as usually are, or may be, safely eaten with acetous juice, oyl, salt, etc., to give them a grateful gust and vehicle."

Before Evelyn's time British cooks generally boiled their salad herbs. Evelyn drew sharp distinction between herbs which should be cooked and those which should be eaten raw. He insisted that "sallet" should be mixed with all the skill that a composer exerts in writing a symphony.

Trout Lean Toward "Delicacies" for "Table"

Washington.—"Feeding the fishes" is not such a simple matter. The dietetic requirements of a trout suitable for the dinner table and to lure the sportsman are decidedly specialized. Experiments carried on by the United States bureau of fisheries show that beef liver, beef heart, and sheep liver will do nicely for spring planting with steelhead, rainbow and brook trout, but when trout are to be reared to a larger size beef liver is what will produce the biggest and best trout.

Something new on the menu may result from experiments with three new fish foods—soy-bean oil meal, a dried shrimp product, and a fresh-water mussel meal. In the future the fresh meat diet may be expanded to include these foods as substitutes for a part of the meat.

Excitement Over New Position Fatal to Girl

St. Paul, Minn.—An offer of a new position is believed to have caused excitement resulting in the death of Miss Bernice Rice, twenty-year-old primary teacher at a local school. Miss Rice had just recently received an offer of a position as teacher at Winona State Teachers' college, where she graduated a year ago, and was greatly excited over the prospect, according to friends. She returned home in apparently good health in the afternoon, but later fainted and died.

SHIP BELL TOLLS IN IDAHO STEEPLE

Once Part of Equipment of the Argonaut.

Vernal, Utah.—A bell of olden days, once part of the equipment of the Argonaut, a ship that sailed the Seven Seas and finally ended its career in a Pacific coast "boneyard," now summons to worship the parishioners of St. John's Lutheran church in American Falls, Idaho. In the early seventies the Argonaut came to the Pacific ocean, making the trip around the Horn, and engaging in freight and passenger traffic in the waters of the North Pacific. More modernly equipped steamers appeared and the Argonaut was relegated to coastwise trade.

In 1880 Ludwig Adolf, father of Christian Adolf of American Falls, Idaho, settled in the newly founded community of Newberg, 25 miles south of Portland, Ore. A Lutheran congregation was organized and Ludwig Adolf was sent to Portland to secure a bell for the church. He found a suitable one in a ship chandler's shop on the waterfront on the Willamette river, and the chandler told him that this bell was once used on the old Argonaut and that it had tolled in many parts of the world.

The Lutheran church of Newberg used the bell until the congregation was disbanded, after existing 36 years. Mr. Adolf had some years before removed to American Falls, Idaho, and when he learned that the bell was no longer used in Newberg he made a journey to his former home and brought the bell back to Idaho.

How Coeds Can Be Thin; Can Eat on $2.50 a Week

Ithaca, N. Y.—The high cost of living need hold no terror for the modern college girl. A class studying foods at the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell university found that the coed can feed herself on $2.50 a week.

This cost figure was declared the smallest sum which would supply the 2,200 calories required by a girl of average size carrying on everyday college studies and activities. In order to do it, however, she must be her own cook and literally know her vegetables. She must also know the cheapest produce markets.

No mention is made of the free meals she may have, so it is expected that the ultra-economical coed following this "food prescription" will have 21 meals at her regular eating place.

Nobby, Footloose Monkey, Is Escorted to Prison

London.—Found wandering in the West end without visible means of support, Nobby, a marmoset, was arrested and taken to the police station. Here he was virtually charged with being a "rogue and vagabond" and placed in a little cell of his own. Nobby made no reply to the charges, showing indifference to the majesty of the law by picking up a penholder off the inspector's desk and recording his visit on the handle by the aid of his teeth.

The prisoner was bailed out by the keeper of the zoo in response to a message from the police and is now living in happier quarters in a sanatorium recovering from a slight chill. How Nobby spent his liberty in the West end is as much of a mystery as his ownership.

Find Human Bones Said to Be 1,000 Years Old

Providence, R. I.—Prof. Edmund B. de La Barre of Brown university has found human bones he believes to be 1,000 years old at Assonet Neck, Mass. The bones, which are bits of human skull and leg bones, were buried under a thick layer of peat at a spot covered by water at high tide, and were grouped in an area scarcely a foot in radius. The bones, Prof. de La Barre believes, may have been preserved from some prehistoric cremation, or may have been in the stomach of some predatory animal when it died.

Pieces of Nibelungen Manuscript Are Found

Berlin.—Fragments of Nibelungen manuscript which is believed to be one of the oldest in existence, were discovered by Dr. Hermann Menhard, director of the Klagenfurt library, at Klagenfurt, Austria, while he was cataloguing the ancient handwritings of the Corinthian archives.

The fragments are written in the Bavarian-Austrian language of the Middle ages and are supposed to have belonged to a wandering minstrel of the Twelfth or Thirteenth century. They are closely written in columns of 30 lines each on a page and are without the ornate initials at the beginning of chapters, customary in manuscripts of a later period.

Effective But Simple Dishes Now In Vogue

Something simple yet effective is the housewife's ideal for week-end dishes.

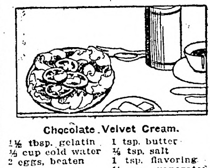
During the warm summer weather, women should not be compelled to spend hours in the preparation of meals, when minutes would accomplish the same purpose. Planning week-end menus should be a congenial task, not a bore. At this time of the year there are a variety of nutritious vegetables and fruits to choose from in preparing meals and the modern home manager takes advantage of them. The housewife plans her summer menus so that they will suggest coolness, while at the same time taking into consideration their dietary value. A delicious cream soup made from fresh vegetables, or an omelet, a fresh fruit dessert, or a custard, a dish of ice cream, or a pudding, are nourishing items that should find high favor in the week-end menu.

The home manager enjoys her week-ends 100 per cent more when she has a few moments of leisure. And in this connection the following recipes may prove an aid.

Creamy Salad Dressing.

1 cup boiled or mayonnaise dressing	milk
¼ cup evaporated	½ cup cream 1 tbsp. sugar 1 tbsp. fruit juice

Combine evaporated milk and cream, chill and whip. Add sugar and juice, then fold into salad dressing. Especially nice for fruit salads.



Chocolate Velvet Cream.

1½ tbsp. gelatin	1 tsp. butter
¼ cup cold water	¼ tsp. salt
2 eggs, beaten separate	1 tsp. flavoring
½ cup sugar	½ cup evaporated milk combined with
2 squares (oz.) chocolate	½ cup whipping cream, chilled and whipped
¾ cup evaported milk diluted with ¾ cup water

Soak gelatin in water five minutes. Mix beaten egg yolks and sugar, pour heated, diluted milk over slowly, put in double boiler with gelatin, butter and salt. Cook until the mixture thickens. This takes about 15 minutes. Strain, beat 2 minutes, let cool. Melt the chocolate over hot water, let cool a little, then add the chocolate and vanilla to the mixture after it has cooled. Fold in the stiff egg whites, then the whipped cream. Turn into a mold and chill at least 3 hours. It may be chilled in individual dessert glasses.

Maybe You're Losing Money and Don't Know It!

CONSIDER the man who invested $975.00 in ten shares of Interstate Power Company Preferred stock when it was first offered at this price by the Company direct to its customers only about 27 months ago.

By July 1, 1927 his $975.00 has earned dividends for him amounting to $157.50. But that sum would have been lost to him if he had NOT invested his savings.

How much will you stand to lose in one year—in two years—in ten years, if you do not invest the money you save?

It isn't really so much a question of whether you can AFFORD to invest, but it is more of a question of whether you can afford NOT to invest. Can you AFFORD TO LOSE the extra dollars your savings could earn for you if you had them safely invested?

The Green Cloak

By Yorke Davis

HAVE you in your travels or in your reading of the South Seas ever heard of the death chant of the Maoris, and do you know its significance? It forms the basis of the plot in this extremely fascinating mystery story. In this case the chant was not heard in faraway New Zealand, but in an American inland city. Read of the amazing double-personality of the girl who wore the green cloak.

Dempsey K. O.'s Sharkey

About a million dollars were spent by fight fans last Thursday evening in New York when 90,000 people watched Jack Dempsey make a great come-back by knocking Jack Sharkey out in the seventh round of a fifteen round bout. It is claimed that Dempsey fouled Sharkey with two low blows below the belt and that when Sharkey doubled up to back away, Dempsey struck a heavey blow to the chin which sent Sharkey to the floor for the count early in the seventh round. Dempsey nailed him with a hook to the jaw, the winning punch that will send Dempsey on to Chicago to face Gene Tunney in September.

Local Nine Is Defeated Again

The local baseball aggregation motored up to Gatzke Sunday evening for another game with the Rollis nine. Loss of members in the lineup and lack of practice showed their effect in the score, 8—4 in favor of Rollis.

It was a good, clean game; practically no errors were committed on either side; and absolutely no rags were chewed at any stage of the game——speaking well for the Rollis boys, who are thorough sports.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Davis, Aug. Nass and Miss Leon Davis spent Friday at Warren.

—19—

So Joe had died, a body clad in gala dress swirling out on currents that would never bring him back. Anne said nothing. She did not feel any special grief, or feeling of any kind. Too much had happened, she was benumbed. She had a vague sense that in some future time, when she had recovered from her dulled and battered state, she might be sorry, cry perhaps. Her eyes fell on her hand with Sybil's clasped around it and the sight of the linked fingers roused her. She lifted her head and looked at the face beside her:

"But—but—why did you do all this? Hide, not say anything, let them think you were dead?"

"I wanted to get away."

"Get away! What for—where?"

"To Jim Dallas. I know where he is."

"You've known?"

"For a month. I've written him telling him I'd come if I could, if I ever could. Oh, but it's been hopeless. I was spied on, dogged, followed—" Her voice rose on a hoarse note, stopped, and after a scared listening hush, went on whispering: "I want to stay dead, never come to life here again. It's my chance—the only chance I'll ever have. You've found me now and I'll tell you everything." And she told Anne the story—the story that no one else has ever heard.

Since she had received his address the longing to join her lover had possessed her. She had written she would come, she knew he was waiting for her, but the watch kept upon her made any move impossible. Whatever her anguish, she could not risk betraying his whereabouts; if it had been only herself she would have dared anything. In this position, growing daily more unbearable, had suddenly come the means of escape. Tragedy, swift and terrible as a bolt from the blue, had been her opportunity, and she had desperately seized it.

From her window, after the interview with Stokes, she had seen Joe, in his Sebastian dress, pass below. She had known it was he because of the costume and was astonished, supposing him already gone. Stokes came into view following him and the disturbing idea seized her that he had mistaken the boy for herself. She had run to the door to go down and end the misapprehension, and then stopped—at close quarters Stokes would see who it was, and to let Joe—evil-tongued and hostile—discovered their rendezvous, was the last thing she wanted. She went back to the window to watch the outcome and saw neither of them. This frightened her—the only place they could have disappeared to was the summer house. Stokes might say too much before he discovered his mistake, and panic-stricken, she was about to rush out, when Joe ran from the doorway and the shot followed.

For a space—she had no idea how long—she was paralyzed, not believing her senses. She remembered moving back into the room and from there she saw Stokes issue from the summer house and flee to the shelter of the pine wood that told her what she had seen was real, a murder had been committed under her eyes, and she went to the door to go down. Holding it open she paused on the threshold, heard the voices below, heard Stokes' entering words and had made a forward step to run down and denounce him, when a sound from outside stopped her, Flora's cry that Sybil was killed.

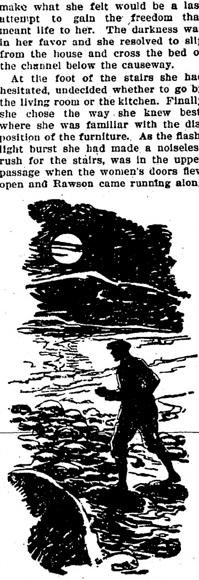
It was that wild screaming voice that gave her the idea, sent it through her brain like a zigzag of lightning. While the people below made their clamorous rush from the house, she stood in the doorway, motionless in contemplation of the possibilities that opened before her. The excitement that had shaken her a few minutes earlier died, her mind steadied and cleared, she felt herself uplifted by an invincible daring and courage. There was no danger of a recovery of the body for she had heard from Gabriel and Miss Pinkney that bodies carried out on the tide were never found.

Alone on the second floor with little fear of interruption she had gone about her preparations at once. She had taken nothing from her own room but money from her purse (leaving a small amount to avert suspicion) the candles from the box on the table, a few crackers she had brought up the night before from supper, and a pair of scissors. Then going to Joe's room she had gathered the clothes he had discarded, lying ready to her hand on the bed—everything from the shoes to the cap—and stolen out and upward to the top floor. Here she had put on the clothes and cut off her hair—she showed Anne the ends of the yellow curls in her jacket pocket—hiding her own clothes in a box in the storeroom.

The next day she had been a prey to a rising tide of alarm. From behind a curtain she had watched the search of the island and realized a hunt through the top floor must follow. Every sign of her presence was obliterated and she studied her surroundings for a hiding place. The windows, opened half way to air the rooms, suggested the possibility of a cache outside. Climbing up the wall and extending to the roof was the great wisteria vine, its cutspread branches twisted into ropes and covered with a mantle of dense foliage. The main trunk passed close to the window of the room that faced the stair-head, the place where she sat waiting for ascending footsteps. When Anne had made her visit, she had heard the first creak of the stairs and crawled out under the raised window. With a foothold on the gutter she had slipped behind the curtain of the vine, her hands gripped round its limbs. Even from the garden below she thought it would have been impossible to detect her. Of Anne's whispered pleadings she had heard nothing; she had supposed the intruder one of the men. When they came up she had had plenty of time to hide for she had heard their footsteps when they came along the hall.

After the visit of Rawson and Williams she knew the danger of detection increased with every hour. Also the necessity for food could not be denied much longer. The one chance left her was to get away that night, make what she felt would be a last attempt to gain the freedom that meant life to her. The darkness was in her favor and she resolved to slip from the house and cross the bed of the channel below the causeway.

At the foot of the stairs she had hesitated, undecided whether to go by the living room or the kitchen. Finally she chose the way she knew best, where she was familiar with the disposition of the furniture. As the flashlight burst she had made a noiseless rush for the stairs, was in the upper passage when the women's doors flew open and Rawson came running along the hall below. The darkness and noise had covered her flight, but in her eyrie on the top floor she had crouched at the head of the stairs sick with uncertainty and dread. The concerted shrieks of the women had come eerily to her—cries of her own name. She guessed then a picture had been taken, they had seen it, and she waited, not knowing what was coming. She had stayed there a long time, listening with every sense alert, heard silence gathering over the house and then gone back to her place by the window:



It Stood Out in Sharp Silhouette.

"I hadn't given up, I had the spirit to fight still. But it was so awful not knowing anything, what they were doing, if they'd found out I was alive. And what was I to do—stay here, get out on the island? I couldn't tell, I was all in the dark, and I felt my nerve weaken for the first time. And then I heard your voice, Anne, 'I'm coming to help you,' it said." She drew back and looked with solemn meaning into the other's face. "You meant it? You will help me?"

"Sybil, you know it."

"There's only one way you can."

"Any way."

"Let me go."

"Never tell—that you were here—that it wasn't you?"

"Yes, let me stay dead. Everybody believes it, let them go on believing. It was death, my life since that night when Jim disappeared. It wasn't worth going on with. Now I can go to him, be with him, there'll be no one watching Sybil Saunders any more. Even if I looked like myself it would be only the chance resemblance to a murdered woman. And do I look like myself?"

She turned her face to the light, bright now with the coming of the sun. Below the smooth sweep of hair across her forehead it was so changed in its pallor and thinness, so bereft of its rounded curves and delicate freshness that it was only a dim reflection of Sybil's—the face of a wayworn lad in whom the same blood ran.

The havoc worked by the suffering that had so transfigured it drove like a knife to Anne's heart. She felt the prick of tears under her eyelids and lowered her head—Sybil gripping at her happiness with the fierce courage of despair, and now Sybil going, breaking all ties, going forever. For a moment she could not speak and the other, thinking her silence meant reluctance to agree, caught at her hands, pleading, with breathless urgence:

"They've accepted everything—it's all explained and ended. Joe has gone, dropped out of sight. Boys of his kind do that, do something they're ashamed of and disappear. What good would it do Stokes or Bassett or the police to know it was Joe who was killed? It's not lies, it's not being false to anyone, it's only to keep silent and let me go. Oh, Anne, we've been real friends, we've loved each other—Love me enough to let me be happy."

The rim of the sun slipped above the distant sea line and sent a ray of brilliant light through the window. It touched their seated figures and lay rosy on Anne's face as she raised it.

"Go," she said softly. "Go. I'll never tell—I'll keep that promise as long as I live."

She could stay no longer, the house would be waking soon. There was a rapid interchange of last injunctions, information for Sybil's safety. Tonight at low tide she would cross on the causeway. Every evidence of her occupation would be removed and with this in mind she took her Viola dress from its hiding place and gave it to Anne. No one, ransacking the top floor at Gull Island would ever find a trace of her.

That night was cloudy—great black banks passing across the heavens. At times they broke and through serene open spaces the moon rode, silvering the sea, turning the pools and streamlets of the channel bed to a shining tracery. A boy's figure that had started across the causeway in the dark, was caught in one of these transitory gleams, a flitting shadow on the straight bright path. It stood out in sharp silhouette, running on the slippery stones, then clouds swept across the moon and in the darkness it gained the shore and the sheltering trees.

Dogs scented its passage and broke out barking; the sound following its progress till the houses were passed and the road stretched on between quiet fields to the railway.

Some people heard the dogs—light-sleeping villagers who turned and wondered if a tramp was about and lapsed into comfortable slumber. In the stillness of the room where Stokes lay unconscious, drawing toward the hour of deliverance, the barking sounded loud and insistent. The nurse was disturbed by it and went to the window and looked out, but Flora never heard it. Anne did and sat up in bed following it along the edge of the village till it died on the outskirts.

EPILOGUE

Three years later Bassett and Anne had a friend at dinner. He was a writer who had just returned from a successful lecture tour in Australia. On his way back he had ranged through the pleasant reaches of the South seas and had fallen under their spell—a little more money in his pocket and for him it would be a plantation on some isle of enchantment. Not the accessible places, they were already spoiled, steamers had come, jazz music, and tourists in pith helmets with red guidebooks were under your feet. It was the remoter islands, still out of the line of travel, where a trading schooner was the sole link with the world.

He had made a point of visiting some of these—hired an old tub with a native crew and gone batting about and had a glimpse of the real thing that Stevenson saw. And he enlarged on a particular island, the endmost of a scattered group, where he had found an American and his wife running a copra plantation. Delightful people called Whittier, he'd stayed several days with them in a long bamboo house on the edge of a lagoon—you couldn't imagine anything more beautiful.

After dinner, moving about in the sitting room, the guest had stopped before a photograph standing on a side table, picked it up and asked whose it was. Bassett had answered—a friend of his wife, now dead.- But he would remember—it was Sybil Saunders who had met with such a tragic death some years ago. The guest nodded; of course he remembered, a horrible affair. Then after a last look at the photograph he turned to Anne:

"It's like that Mrs. Whittier I was telling you about. Just the same eyes—quite remarkably like, only she's a bit stouter and more mature. It might have been her picture when she was a girl."

When the evening was over Bassett escorted the guest to the door. On his way back to the sitting room he thought he would suggest to Anne that she put away the photograph—people noticed it and the subject kept coming up. It was evidently unbearably painful to her for she rarely spoke of it; that dark chapter in her life was a thing closed and sealed. He had the words on his lips as he entered the room and then saw that she held the picture in her hands and was looking intently at it, softly smiling, her expression tranquil, even happy. That was good—the wound had healed—so he said nothing.

[THE END.]

Etiquette Constant Problem

Proper manners are set by the leaders of every age in history, and yet "high society" is hardly less guilty than the lower social orders at times. The situation became so bad during the reign of Louis XIV in France, when they had poor eating manners, that books of instruction were issued then as now. At one time the fork was held "indecent."

MINNESOTA BRIEFS

St. Paul—Oscar Smith, former state immigration commissioner, was appointed as superintendent of scales by the Minnesota railroad and warehouse commission.

St. Paul—Two members of the St. Paul "knot hole gang," of juvenile baseball fans were killed by a train while taking a short cut to Lexington park to see the game.

Minneapolis—The 1928 convention of the National Education association will be held in Minneapolis, provided satisfactory hotel accommodations are guaranteed, the directors of the N.E.A. decided.

St. Paul—The total amount of federal taxes paid by the state of Minnesota for the fiscal for 1927 was $28,441,784.81, of which amount $26,219,370.70 was income taxes and $2,222,414.11 was miscellaneous taxes.

So. St. Paul—A record price of $13 a hundred-weight, the highest paid in two years for a carload of steers, was reported at the South St. Paul Union stockyards. The 29 head, which averaged 1,185 pounds each were Herefords and were owned by J. C. Howe of Casselton, N. D.

St. Paul—Automobile license receipts for the first half of 1927 show an increase of $371,727 over the receipts for the same period of 1926, Charles M. Babcock, state commissioner of highways announced. Receipts for the first half of the year total $9,684,992.

Minneapolis — Minnesota farmers planted 442,000 fewer acres to small grains this year than in 1926, but on the basis of present estimates will get 38,800,000 more bushels of grain from their fields, the July crop report indicated. The report is by Paul H. Kirk, agricultural statistician, Minnesota University.

St. Paul—Vernon Ewing, of Tamarack, whose efforts to obtain divine manifestations brought him considerable attention last year, plans on bringing his evangelical work into the state capitol. He announced at Tamarack that he will conduct a "silent prayer" in St. Paul on August 1, beginning at 11 a. m.

Minneapolis—Barge freight rates 60 per cent under existing rail rates on grain shipped from Minneapolis to New Orleans for export were published here by W. W. Morse, operating manager of the Upper Mississippi Barge Line Company. The new tariffs will become effective August 15, coincident with the actual establishment of a regular freight service by the barge line company.

St. Peter—On the musty testimony of an old letter found a year ago in the trunk of a man who had been his guardian, William A. Larson, 71 years old, of Mellott, Ind., finds himself an heir in a rich estate here. He learns also that, instead of being without a living relative as he had supposed, he has a sister, Mrs. Johanna Johnson of Tacoma, Wash., as well as seven half brothers and sisters.

St. Paul—Minnesota judges conducting their annual meeting in the senate chambers of the state capitol voted to organize the District Judges' Association of the State of Minnesota as a permanent body. Judge Carol A. Nye of Moorhead was elected president with Judge Grier M. Orr of St. Paul vicepresident and Judge W. W. Bardwell of Minneapolis secretary-treasurer.

St. Paul—An appeal to local officers for stringent enforcement of the motor vehicle license law was issued by Charles M. Babcock, state highway commissioner, as one of the important details in the furtherance of highway construction. Mr. Babcock pointed out that only three highway employes are available to check violations of the license law and that with more than 600,000 motor vehicles being operated in the state.

St. Paul—Crown Prince Gustav Adolf of Sweden conferred a further honor on a Twin City woman, Lydia Caroline Bungener, head cook in the St. Paul home of Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg, received a diploma of a court medal which the Swedish heir awarded her on his visit here a year ago. Nils Leon Jaenson, Swedish viceconsul in Minneapolis, gave the diploma to Governor Theodore Christianson for transmission to Miss Bungener.

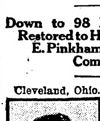
St. Paul—Minnesota district court judges whose salaries were ordered increased through a state supreme court decision upholding the pay increase bill passed by the last legislature, will not receive the additional money for at least two years, Ray P. Chase, state auditor, predicted Friday. "There was no money appropriated to cover these increases," Mr. Chase explained. "Payment must wait until the money is available."

Feed Supply for Stock

There are few classes of live stock that can pay returns for purchased feeds. This is particularly true if the purchased feeds are roughages or feeds that can be readily grown in the community. The late summer months reveal the probable supplies of feed for the coming winter. A little thought may indicate ways in which adequate supplies of rough feeds can be assured for all classes of live stock that are to be wintered.

SHE WENT FROM BAD TO WORSE

Down to 98 Pounds—Finally Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound



Cleveland, Ohio.—"After having my first baby, I lost weight, no matter what I did. Then a doctor told me I would be better if I had another baby, which I did. But I got worse, was always sickly and went down to 98 pounds. My neighbor told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it helped her very much, so I tried it. After taking four bottles, I weigh 116 pounds. It has just done wonders for me and I can do my housework now without one bit of trouble."—Mrs. M. Riessinger, 10004 Nelson Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

If some good fairy should appear, and offer to grant your heart's desire, what would you choose? Wealth? Happiness?

Health? That's the best gift. Health is riches that gold cannot buy and surely health is cause enough for happiness.

Humor Found Even in Somber English Jails

Rev. Eustace Jervis, at one time or another chaplain at some of the largest English jails, tells these two stories in his book, "Twenty-five Years in Six Prisons":

There was a very refined but sad-looking doctor at one prison. A man who was under sentence of death complained of toothache. He asked the doctor if he would take the tooth out for him. The doctor looked at him sadly for a moment or two, and said: "Do you really think that it is worth while?"

A wife whose husband was "doing" three years wrote that she would have nothing to do with him when he came out. She said she had met a very nice gentleman, who had taken her and the three children to live with him. They had tea for dinner every night, he took them to the pictures, and had bought the children new clothes and boots. She had never been so happy, and comfortable and cared for in her life. After bidding him farewell, she signed herself:

"Your broken-hearted wife, Clara."

Explained

"That stunning woman over there has been wanting to meet you all the evening."

"I know it, but I must refuse."

"I think you owe her an apology."

"No, I owe her alimony."—Boston Transcript.

COWBOY IS NOW TURNING FARMER

Rider Loses Battle Against Economic Change.

Washington.—The cowboy of the northern ranges is passing, believes Mary Roberts Rhinehart, the novelist. In her latest book, "Lost Ecstasy," she pictures the cowman waging a losing battle against restricted range, hordes of sheep and the force of economic change.

"The eastern demand for young beef and the increasing tendency of farmers in the Middle West to sell their grain on the hoof, has increased the cowman's problem," says Mrs. Rinehart, who has spent parts of many years in the cattle country, winter and summer. She confesses the bitterness of one to whom "the passing of the cowman is a personal tragedy."

"For the last six years it was thought in Wyoming and Montana that the slump in prices for range stock was temporary," she continues. "But now they are realizing that the cattle industry of the old days will never return. To own cattle is, in bad years, to be poor in proportion to the number you own. And so out goes the cowhand. What is he to do? Become a farmhand?

He was an aristocrat, a free lance whose equipment was his nerve and his skill. Now he becomes a tiller of the fields, with equipment manufactured in Chicago."

"It is not that I regard the change as a retrogression," she said. "But for the individual it is something of the sort. His skilled profession is taken away. But the blow to pride in his greatest blow.

"From being an artist in his line he must become a mere unit of man power. I have seen them, my own friends, go to driving a team in the fields or a truck between the little towns. Sometimes they take to clerking in stores.

"But when spring comes they are apt to gather up their saddles and spurs and move on. There may be little work for them left, but a rumor of it is sufficient to call them. And some of them regard it as more suitable to be a cowpuncher out of work than a farmhand making money."

Big Lava Cave of Idaho Is Now Being Explored

Idaho Falls, Idaho.—Exploration of what is believed to be the largest lava cave in the United States has begun at Twin Buttes, west of Idaho Falls. Boy scouts of Teton Peak's council, the Idaho Falls Chamber of Commerce and others are making the exploration.

Located between the Twin Buttes, sister peaks, which lie isolated from all other mountains on a flat, barren, desolate stretch of sand, the cave yawns with an air of mystery at the bottom of a 40-foot lava crater. The opening presents weird formations of rock, left ages ago by nature's molding of molten and rapid-flowing lava from long-since extinct volcanoes.

Tortuous twists and phenomenal phantasies of nature's handiwork are embellished in the tunnel.

If the cave is as large as the prospective explorers believe, southeastern Idaho will add another mark on its already well spotted map of scenic attractions and natural wonders. It is pointed out that the cave is larger than Kentucky's Mammoth cave and contains more formations than Oregon's caves along the Columbia river.

Town Limits Oil Wells to Save Its Buildings

Oxford, Kan.—Because it appeared probable this town might have to move to make way for oil rigs, the city council has passed an ordinance limiting drilling to one well in each city block. All property owners in the block shall receive a prorated royalty in the event of production, according to their holdings in square feet.

Soon after oil was found here a feverish boom developed in town-lot oil leases and virtually every square inch of the city, except the streets and public property, was placed under lease. The opera house was torn down and an oil well started in the former basement.

When plans developed to tear down other buildings and to sink numerous wells in front yards the city stepped in and called a halt.

Australian Bushmen Fast Vanishing Race

Washington.—The Australian bushmen apparently are preparing to join the dodo, the passenger pigeon and the mammoth in the limbo of extinction.

This aborigine has been notable chiefly by reason of the scientific conclusion that he personifies very closely the lowest standard of human culture. By comparison, the early American Indian was a model of civilization.

The decline of the bushman is noted in a report to the Commerce department from Sydney. A census just completed concludes that the death rate among them is five of each 100 annually. The latest census placed their number at 52,296

DROP IN SARDINES AFFECTS BRITTANY

Fishermen and Cannery Workers Stirred Up.

Washington.—What price sardines? In France just now this is more than a question of gustatory interest. The price of the little fishes has fallen so low that the discouraged fishermen and cannery workers of Brittany, the world's chief source of sardines, are threatening Bolshevism, and have even elected "commissars of the people," according to press dispatches. Brittany and its leading industry are the subjects of the following bulletin from Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society.

"For more reasons than one Brittany might be called 'the Ireland of France,'" says the bulletin. "The Bretons are Celts, cousins of the Irish. They have the same interest in things of the spirit, and the same tendency, on occasion, to emotional outbursts. For centuries, too, they had the same antagonism toward outside rule that so long animated the Irish. For 1,500 years they fought successfully against Roman, Norman, English and French, for the independence of Brittany. They managed to keep a parliament of their own until the French revolution.

Has France's Best Harbors.

"Today Brittany has no political existence, and is not even represented on many maps. It occupies the spout of the French 'teapot,' the westernmost peninsula of France, the northern coast of which forms the southern mouth of the English channel. This land, about the size of Maryland, was formerly Armorica, but got its present name during the Fifth and Sixth centuries because of the heavy immigration of Britons, driven from across the channel by the Angles and Saxons. It is a rough country, covered with rocks and hills and semi-mountains. Its coast line is deeply indented, and has the best harbors in France. This fact and the existence of large numbers of fish offshore, turned the eyes of the Bretons seaward. They are France's greatest fishermen and her chief reliance as material for her navy and merchant marine.

"Many sorts of fish and sea food are taken in Brittany waters, but by far the leading product is the sardine.

"Brittany's sardine industry began to develop in 1845 when the first cannery was built. This was not long after the preservation of food products by canning had been placed on a sound basis. Now there are more than 200 canneries in the region. The sardine fishermen number 30,000 or more, and some 20,000 workers, mostly girls and women, are engaged in the packing industry

"The prosperity of Brittany hinges on the little fish, and it is fickle in its favors. Some years there will be practically none in the offshore waters, and as many as four poor years have followed one another. When this happens there is real suffering; at times 80,000 people have been practically on the verge of starvation, and the French government has had to lend a hand.

"The sardines are taken in nets in the meshes of which they are caught by their gills. It is necessary, however, to use large quantities of bait, salted cod eggs. When a school of sardines appears near a fishing boat, bait is thrown beyond the dangling net, and the little fishes rushing for the falling food, are snared in the meshes. The net is then lifted aboard and the fish gently shaken out. The fishing takes place near shore and often the fish are in the canneries within an hour or so after they are taken from the water.

"The fishermen sell by the thousand, according to size, the larger fish bringing the best price. Prices range from one dollar to five per thousand, according to conditions. The cannery workers go through a complicated procedure. They clean and behead the little fishes, soak them in brine, dry them in wire baskets, immerse the baskets of fishes in boiling oil, pack the sardines in tin boxes, pour in oil, seal the boxes, and finally boil them in huge cauldrons of water for two hours. The boxes are then labeled and are ready for market.

Prehistoric Monuments.

"Inland Brittany is an agricultural country, but much of the land is infertile. There are numerous wild moorlands. On these are some of the most interesting prehistoric remains found in Europe, the rough stone monuments of the early Celts. Huge stones have been stood on end. These are known as 'menhirs.' When they have been placed in circles or arcs (as in the British Stonehenge made also by Celts at about the same time) they are called 'cromlechs.' When the great upright stones support horizontal ones they are 'dolmens.' The most striking of these monuments are the alignments of menhirs.

"The early Celts are supposed to have erected the stones in connection with their religious rites, and apparently the great Carnac alignment was a sort of Mecca and a holy burial place. Keystones in the cromlechs were oriented with regard to certain seasonal positions of the sun. This has furnished a clew for astronomers and archeologists working together, and they have computed the approximate building date of the oldest monuments at 2000 B. C. The latest of the monuments were probably erected during the first century, B. C."

WILL VISIT "LOST WORLD" OF NOVEL

American Museum Expedition Will Explore Place.

New York.—The scene of Conan Doyle's famous novel and movie, "The Lost World," will be visited and its animal life studied this summer by T. D. Carter and G. H. H. Tate of the American Museum of Natural History in their expedition to Mount Roraima, Brazil, under the auspices of Lee Garnett Day.

Mount Roraima, which is in the northern tip of Brazil bordering on British Guiana, is an ancient district geologically. With some of the country south of the Amazon it formed a continent ages before the formation of the rest of South America. This was long before the existence of the Amazon river. Later the Amazon divided the old continent, and new land appeared, forming the South America of today.

Mount Roraima consists of a plain from which rises a sugar-loaf mountain with sharp cliffs. The geological structure of the plain differs from that of the mountain. The plain is thought to date back to the proterozoic era, one of the earliest periods in which life is known to have existed. The mountain, however, is of red sandstone, probably of the Jurassic period of the age of reptiles, a much later time.

Because of the early formation of this land, Mount Roraima became one of the first strongholds for mammals and birds when they appeared upon the earth. Little is known of the present-day animal life of this region and it is hoped that the expedition will bring to light some interesting species. The dinosaurs and pterodactyls of Conan Doyle's romance have, of course, been dead for many ages, but relics of archaic mammalian and bird faunas probably haunt the region still

15,000 Cypriotes Roam About Without Country

Cairo.—The unhappy plight of the "man without a country" seems to be multiplied many times in the case of Cypriotes, as the natives of Cypress are called in Egypt, and that entirely without any fault of their own. It will be recalled that Cyprus formally was annexed by Great Britain at the outbreak of the war with Turkey, in November, 1914, and in that act all the inhabitants of the island were made British subjects. There were and are today in Egypt, however, about 15,000 Cypriotes, for whom no provision was made in the act of annexation.

For a dozen years they have occupied an equivocal position, not having renounced their allegiance to Cyprus, and yet not being recognized as subjects of the new sovereign of that island. Now the Egyptian government puts them in an awkward quandry by demanding peremptorily that they either become Egyptian subjects or citizens or else quit the country as undesirable aliens.

The Cypriotes have sent a delegation to London to appeal to the British government for its protection, assuming that if it extends its citizenship to them, as it did to the actual residents of Cyprus, they will be enabled thus to remain in Egypt, where their interests chiefly lie, or else to return to Cyprus as citizens of that island.

Mountain Fort Stands Guard on Adriatic Sea

Vallona, Albania.—Saseno (or Sazan), the mountain in the sea that guards the entrance to the landlocked harbor of Vallona, has acquired the new name of "The Italian Sentinel of the Balkans."

Albanians say the Italians, who acquired it from Albania a few years ago, have so fortified it that it not only protects the harbor but that its guns, uniting their fire with those of Brindisi can close the Adriatic to any sort of navigation. They can also command the Albanian coast as far north as Durazzo.

The island, rising gradually from the sea to a height of 500 feet, is of limestone. Roads the Italians have built to the summit and the earthworks erected there and on the flanks of the mountain may be seen from a distance.

War Delays Hunt for Cradle of Mankind

Tacoma, Wash.—War and science should be divorced. At least so thinks Roy Chapman Andrews of the expedition in Mongolia and the Gobi desert seeking the cradle of mankind.

Because of disturbed conditions in Mongolia and China the scientists have postponed exploration work for a year and all members of the party will return early to the United States.

George Olson, member of the expedition reached here recently on the President Jefferson and reported the scientific equipment assembled at great expense was menaced in the first leg of the journey toward Gobi and that Andrews decided to take no chances of meeting brigands.

Maybe You're Losing Money and Don't Know It!

CONSIDER the man who invested $975.00 in ten shares of Interstate Power Company Preferred stock when it was first offered at this price by the Company direct to its customers only about 27 months ago.

By July 1, 1927 his $975.00 has earned dividends for him amounting to $157.50. But that sum would have been lost to him if he had NOT invested his savings.

How much will you stand to lose in one year—in two years—in ten years, if you do not invest the money you save?

It isn't really so much a question of whether you can AFFORD to invest, but it is more of a question of whether you can afford NOT to invest. Can you AFFORD TO LOSE the extra dollars your savings could earn for you if you had them safely invested?

Minnesota State Fair Said To Be Better than Ever

Sousa's Band Will Be Stellar Attraction.

The 68th Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Dairy Exposition, September 3 to 10, will present the biggest entertainment and educational program ever planned by it, President William F. Sanger announced today.

Sousa's Band, the greatest band in the world, headed by John Philip Sousa, famous band leader, will be the feature attraction. This wonderful band of 70 pieces will play the first seven days of the Fair, the largest engagement ever given it by any state fair.

The Fair is offering $136,611 in premiums for educational exhibits. Most of this is set aside for livestock; and one of the biggest cattle, horse, swine, and sheep shows ever held in the middle west is assured. The unusually good crop conditions insure a splendid exhibit of farm crops, fruits, flowers, and vegetables.

There will be three days of auto racing, Sept. 3, 7, and 10; and four days of harness and running horse racing, Sept. 5, 6, 8, and 9. Sig Haugdahl, king of dirt track drivers, heads a field of two dozen auto racers, while purses totaling $20,000 are offered for horse racing.

"The Fall of Troy" is to be the big fireworks spectacle this year. Two stages of the best open-air circus acts in the world have been engaged for the vaudeville show in front of the grandstand. A dozen noted Northwest bands and orchestras will play during the week.

The most liberal railroad rates ever given the Fair have been announced by Northwest railroads, which makes an attendance of half a million persons certain.

Several carloads of people from this villiage and vicinity motored to Thief River Falls yesterday to take in the Pennington county fair.

Farewell Party Given

A number of friends and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. S. Reierson and family tendered them a farewell party at their home here Saturday evening. A sum of money was presented to them as a rememberance from the people of this village.

Blueberry Crop Not Up to Expectations

The bumper blueberry crop predicted earlier in the summer will not materialize. Every indication pointed to a crop as big as the record crop of a few years back. A slight frost and other unfavorable conditions must have hit the plants between blossoming and ripening periods; for, while there will be a quantity of the berries harvested, there will not be any glutting of the market.—Roseau Times-Region.

Heavy Traffic Passes Here

About five hundred cars of all kinds of makes and from all parts of the country passed thru here on Sunday bound for the big blueberry fields around Lake of the Woods. License plates from seven diffent states and Canada were seen on the cars. Every day several auto loads of tourists are seen passing thru here to spend their vacation in the beautiful lake regions of the northern part of the state.

The Holt unit of the W. C. T. U. had thir annual meeting at the Paul Olson home on Monday. The present officers of the local unit were all reelected.

Notice to Gossipers

IF YOU must absolutely talk about some one all the time, try talking about yourself for a change. We dislike bragging, but prefer it to this eternal GOSSIPING.

When someone tells you a juicy thing or two about someone else, try and repeat it——if repeat it you must!——as much in the same way as you heard it, and don't go around and make a big fuss and circulate it all over in an untrue way.

If some of you sensation-mongers don't gradually quieten down and shut up, some day we are going to come out with a full-page expose that will make someone far from a Dark Horse in this race of gossiping.

We're getting tired of gossip. Beware!

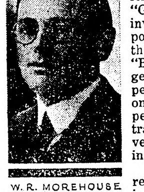
WHY WIDOWS ARE THE SPECIAL PREY OF CONFIDENCE MEN

By W. R. MOREHOUSE

Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association



W. R. MOREHOUSE

WOMEN are often easy victims for the high-pressure promoter. Widows are especially sought out by the confidence men. Even before their deceased husbands, protectors and counselors are buried the wolves of high finance are waiting outside their doors. They know the defenseless widows will be easy prey. Many a woman today is penniless as a result of making poor investments. "Getting rich quick" for the widow without investment experience is in reality getting poor quick. Once a sharp promoter gets the confidence of a rich widow he has a "Bonanza" as he calls it. Eventually he gets the estate and the widow gets the experience. Widows with estates should be on guard every minute. They are marked persons, with promotion crooks hot on their trail. The best thing that every woman investor can do is to consult her banker before investing.

Properly cut and set, crystals sparkle in realistic imitation of diamonds. The same is true in the field of finance. There is that which is fraudulent parading as the genuine. Don't buy investments simply because they sparkle. In the realm of wildcat financing, fictitious credentials, testimonials, and references are employed to give setting and genuine appearance. Some are such rank imitations that they are easily recognized, but others defy detection except on the closest investigation by an expert. The only safe procedure is to investigate under competent advice.

Literally millions of dollars are lost to American savers annually as the outcome of buying into something—a fraudulent farm promotion, a business or a job that is nothing more or less than a set-up to catch suckers.

Often the savings of a lifetime are lost by buying unimproved farm lands with the understanding that the seller, or a service company promoted by him, will plant the farm to trees or vines, care for them, market the crop and turn the profits, which, it is promised, will be big, over to the owner. But this dream never comes true. The so-called guaranteed big profits are never realized. If people would only stop long enough to consider all angles of an offer like that before investing they would see the folly of plunging blindly into such a proposition. Let them ask themselves only this one question: "If it is true that such big profits are to be made, why is the seller so eager to part with his property, even to the extent of making it easy for a new owner to farm it?" The answer is that the land is not worth the selling price, nor will the profits derived from it be anywhere near as large as promised.

Buying into the fox business, the poultry business, the dairy business or any kind of business is risky unless you deal with reliable persons or firms whose word is as good as gold. Watch the seller who is insistent in forcing a sale upon you. Look at his proposition from every angle. Just because he makes glowing promises is no assurance that he is not the world's champion exaggerator Extravagant and exaggerated claims are the earmarks of the fake investment. If you want to go into farming or buy into a business, investigate before you invest. Write to the National Better Business Bureau, New York, or consult your local banker. If they are without information on your proposed investment, wait until they can get the facts and report to you. They have no interest at stake except to forestall crooked games.

More Rumors of the Proposed Backus Ry.

It is being strongly rumored that E. W. Backus will actually commence work on his railroad across Lake of the Woods county next winter (do we hear a snicker?) and that a considerable stretch of roadbed will be completed next summer. The road is supposed to keep on going until it gets to Thief River Falls.

We wouldn't bet a nickle on it, but anyway the rumor is in circulation, and we are keeping it rumoring.—Baudette Region.

1,000 People Picnic at Red Lake Narrows

Is Great Success In Spite of Rain.

A hard shower early Sunday morning failed to dampen the enthusiasm of picnickers of this and surrounding vicinities, and a crowd estimated at more than 1,000 people participated in an outing at the Red Lake Narrows and enjoyed the program provided by the Red Lake Summer Resort association. A large number went from this city.

The program consisted of a short speaking program, a medicine, squaw and war dance by several Indians who appeared in full regalia, water sports, and other recreational activities.

The Association recently secured a lease on the Narrows property for another five years and also was instrumental in securing action on the road project which will assure the construction of a graveled highway to the Narrows next year, thus shortening the route about 20 miles making the distance 50 miles as compared to 70 miles, the present route.

Last Sunday's dispatch carried a story on the picnic, two photographs of Red Lake and a picture of Math Barzen, president of the Association. Olaf Neset was in charge of arrangements for the event.

The Thief River Falls Municipal band furnished the music.

A New Way to Make Jellies

Without Staining Fingers—Without Long Hours of Boiling—Without Depending Upon Berries or Fruit Being in Season.

One of the most interesting and yet one of the simplest new products in the food field is called minute jelly. It is pure fruit or berry juice already boiled down and concentrated. To this concentrated juice, fruit pectin in the right amount has been added. The pectin is that part of fruit which makes jelly "jell." It is as pure and wholesome as the fruit juice.

To make the jelly take the little bottle of concentrated juice, pour in a sauce pan, add water and sugar according to directions on the bottle and boil a few minutes. Then pour into jelly glasses and when it has become cold you have the most delicious pure fruit jelly you ever tasted.

A few bottles kept on hand, selected according to your taste for jellies, and you can make up a few glasses just as you want it. One small bottle makes two glasses of jelly. If you wish to try two bottles send us twenty-five cents and we will give you your choice of grape, mint, pineapple, orange, raspberry, strawberry or blackberry. Or four bottles—all different—for fifty cents. Address Department WU, General Packing Corp., Cranford, New Jersey.—Adv.

CHAPTER I

—1—

Doctor McAlister has often told me that I take life seriously because I am young. That may or may not be the reason, but I am convinced that I know the reason why he takes it so light-heartedly. It is not because he is old, but because he has already won from life all the reward he wants. In his own department of science—applied psychology—he has achieved about as high a place as it is possible for a man to reach. In this field his reputation does not have to lower its colors to any other in the world; and if in his periods of relaxation he chooses to be frivolous, no one can afford frivolity any better than he. I suppose that the very idea of frivolity used in connection with Prof. Ronald McAlister's name would make most people laugh because of the grotesque unfitness of it; and the people who know him only as a gaunt, gray old bachelor, with a rugged, homely, deeply lined Scotch face and a big rough voice, would be right to laugh.

But I am more an adopted son of his than a mere assistant, and after spending the daily number of hours in his laboratory, watching him work his miracles, I see his great mind relax, and find that he is just a boy, more of a boy than ever I was in my life.

He likes the daily papers—the yellower they are, the better; and he devours a perfectly incredible number of detective stories, good and bad. His delight over a good one is almost pathetic.

So when I read the headlines in the morning papers that day, I knew perfectly well that when work was over and we met at our special little table in a corner of the brilliant dining room of The Meredith, I should be regaled with a thrilling and enthusiastic account of the Oak Ridge murder.

It was easy indeed to prefigure the whole scene. Similar ones had been enacted so many times before. I didn't altogether relish the prospect, for I hate to see people smiling and nodding behind my old chief's back, people who, intellectually or socially, or in any other way, aren't fit to tie his shoes. He doesn't mind their smiles, and the light-hearted emptiness of their lives has a mysterious sort of attraction for him.

And when I see him across our little table, his twinkling gray eyes glowing with excitement, his long ungainly arms and expressive hands working away in enthusiastic gesticulation, his big voice booming out the story of some sensational crime, I can't really wonder that a good many people nod and wink and giggle.

The thing I did wonder at sometimes was, that Wilkins, the obsequious, omnipresent, invaluable head-waiter, contrived to preserve his respectful mask of professional imperturbability.

I had a sneaking fondness for Wilkins, based upon the fact that he at least did not underrate Doctor McAlister. Tonight, for instance, it was Wilkins himself whom I saw conducting him down the long lane of tables, to the corner of the room where we always sat.

"Tell our man what to bring us, Wilkins," he said, waving away the menu which that irreproachable functionary offered him. "You know what we want to eat, better than wo do."

Then he turned to me, "Well, have you read about it?"

"The Oak Ridge murder?" I asked smiling. "No, I've waited to get the account of it from you."

"You really haven't read a word of it?" he asked.

"Not a word. I know that Oak Ridge is one of our more remote and less fashionable suburbs, and that there has been a murder there within the past forty-eight hours. Beyond that, my ignorance is complete."

"Youth! Youth!" cried the doctor in mock dismay. "What is it coming to? Fancy being under thirty and waiting all day for such a story as that, rather than read an account of it in bad English. Well, you shall have the story now from the beginning—Wait a bit, though. Wilkins—"

The head-waiter looked up from a low-voiced discussion of the menu with the man who had special charge of our table. "Yes, sir."

"Has Ashton come in yet?"

"Not yet, sir, but he should be here before long. He's seldom later than this, sir."

"Serve for three at this table, then," said the doctor, "and when Ashton comes in, ask him to dine with us"; then, turning to me, "There are some points which the newspapers don't cover that he'll be likely to know about."

Ashton, I may say, was a rising young assistant in the district attorney's office, and I will add that he worked at the detection and prosecution of crime, con amore; it was not upon his salary that he lived at The Meredith.

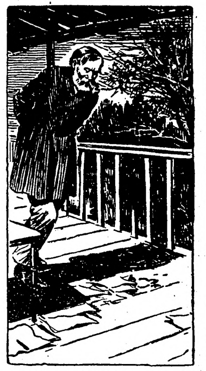
The doctor leaned his elbows on the table and pointed a long finger at me. "Now, in the first place, all we know of Henry Morgan begins three years ago."

"Was Henry Morgan the name of the man who was murdered?" I asked.

"Yes—yes, at least it's the name he went by during the last three years of his life, while he spent at Oak Ridge. He got off the train there one morning with a hand bag and a check for a small steamer trunk, both well-worn and both unmarked with any initial. He went straight to the real estate office of one James McCloskey and said he wanted to rent a house.

"McCloskey took him house-hunting, and, much to that gentleman's surprise, the only place in town that took Morgan's fancy was a large, dilapidated old house in one of its remoter quarters. The old place was in a state of considerable disrepair, and it contained a lot of rattle-trap furniture which the owner had never moved away. McCloskey had confessed that he had never expected to find a tenant for it. The question of repairs didn't seem to interest Mr. Morgan much, a patch or two in the roof and new lights of glass in the broken windows comprising all he asked for.

"When McCloskey asked him what family he had and when he expected them to arrive, Mr. Morgan answered that he had no family and intended to live alone. He did, in fact, live alone, without even the service of a housekeeper, for a number of months, but finally engaged a respectable old woman, who lived in straightened circumstances not very far away, to come every day and cook his meals and keep his house in order. He let her in every morning in time to get breakfast, and she went away every night about seven o'clock, after washing up the supper dishes.



"Half an Hour Later Some Passers-by Saw Him Striding Up and Down His Rickety Old Veranda."

"There, you have, practically, the story of his life in Oak Ridge, up to two nights ago. Two nights ago the old woman got supper for him for the last time, and went home as usual about seven o'clock. Half an hour later some passers-by saw him striding up and down his rickety old veranda, smoking a pipe. Yesterday morning when his housekeeper knocked at the kitchen door, there was no answer. Then she went around to the front of the house and rang the bell, also without result. She walked back a little way up the lawn and saw that one of the windows in a sort of study he had on the third floor was open.

"Well, it seems that she told various people about her fears that all was not well with her employer, but you know what a town of that description is like. There aren't any police. Most of the men in the place commute to town on the early trains, and with one thing and another, it was ten o'clock, or so, before the house was forcibly broken open.

"The investigators found nothing disturbed either on the first floor or on the second, but in the old gentleman's study, a finished-off room in the attic, with a couple of dormer windows, they found him dead in his chair. He was leaning back in a queer, unnatural attitude, and when they looked more closely, they found that he had been strangled with a catgut string from an old violin of his. An A string," he went on, with rising voice and finger that gesticulated only about six inches from my nose—"an A string that had been deliberately removed from the fiddle and slipped in a noose around his neck, while he sat there in his chair, and drawn taut. What do you say to that, eh?"

"I don't see why they call it murder," said I. "Why isn't suicide the more likely explanation?"

"Oh, wise young judge," he mocked. "For just this reason, my boy; that the end of the string wasn't fastened to anything. He couldn't have committed suicide in that way, unless he could reach around after he was dead and untie the knot behind the back of his neck. No, it's murder, and I should be inclined to say a singularly pure example of it."

"There's no connection whatever with his past?" I inquired. "Didn't McCloskey ask for any references at the time Morgan rented the house?"

"He says he did on that first day, and Mr. Morgan assured him that there would be no difficulty on that score; he would present his references in a day or two. As a matter of fact, he never did, but as he paid a quarter's rent in advance, and as he signed an indeterminate lease of a house which the agent never expected to get off his hands, McCloskey didn't like to press the matter. He used furniture that he found in the house, and never brought in any effects of his own, beyond what came with him on the first day, in his hand bag and his little trunk. He never got any letters from out of town, and apparently never sent off any. What his business was, if he had any, no one ever knew."

"You say that nothing on the first or on the second floor had been disturbed. That would dispose of the theory of robbery."

"The whole appearance of the house and its condition would contradict the theory of any ordinary robbery," the doctor said. "No one would break into that dilapidated old structure for such a purpose, unless he had knowledge of some secret and unusual sort of treasure there. But to my mind, the manner of killing disposes even of that alternative. The house is situated in a lonely spot, remote from all other habitation. If a robber had found himself in a position where he was obliged to kill, he could have risked a pistol shot, and he couldn't have garroted his victim without taking him unawares. No, I believe it to be a case of murder, pure and simple—murder committed for its own sake and not the by-product of some other result. And these cases, you know, are rather rare—"

"Here comes Mr. Ashton now, sir," said Wilkins from where he stood not far away. "I'll have dinner served at once, sir."

Both the doctor and I like Ashton, and he often dines with us, even when there is no particular excuse, such as was offered by the Oak Ridge murder, for doing so.

He is a burly, confident, quick-tempered, generous-minded young chap of about thirty, and if he keeps on as he has begun, he will some day acquire a reputation as one of the greatest prosecutors in the country.

He was not in evening dress tonight, and he dropped into his chair at our table with the air of one who has put in a trying day.

"Confound these suburban trains," he said. "I just spent the better part of an hour in one coming in from Oak Ridge."

"Ha!" cried the doctor, with an air of the most intense satisfaction. "Then you're just the man I want to see. Did you turn up anything at the afternoon session of the inquest? The account in the evening papers leaves off at noon."

Ashton laughed. "You'll not get a word out of me about that murder, until after the fish. If you attempt to I shall call on Wilkins here for help. However," he added seriously, "I do want to talk about this case with you, for I think it not unlikely that you may be able to help us."

Curious Old Custom of Literary Giants

Lipogrammatic works, the product of the early Greek authors, are those books in which one letter of the alphabet is omitted throughout the volume. Tryphiodorus, when writing his Odyssey, had not an "a" in his first book, nor a "b" in his second. In so doing he was but copying the Lipogrammatic Iliad of Nestor.

Athenaeus writes of an ode by Pindar in which the latter purposely omitted the letter "s," thereby leading us to surmise that this little hoax was one of the literary fashions of the day. A Persian poet once read to the celebrated Jami one of his own compositions with the letter Alif consistently omitted throughout. Jami, who did not care for the sonnet, sarcastically made the following recommendation: "You can do a better thing yet, take away all the letters from every word you have written."

Although the Greeks originated this ingenious literary device, its use was by no means exclusive with them. Lope de Vega, the celebrated Spanish dramatic poet of the Sixteenth century, Gregorio Leti, and at a much later day Lord North of the court of James I all employed this literary device and produced Lipogrammatic books.—Market for Exchange.

Train Speed Cuts Static

Static decreases and radio-station strength increases with and in proportion to acceleration in the train's speed, experiments with a receiver have shown, according to Popular Mechanics Magazine. A steel bridge with no superstructure helped to increase the volume of the reception, while one with a superstructure decreased it.

Build House for Comfort

Rambling rooms may be romantic to look upon, but the romance caused by inconvenience and lack of comfort soon fades. Not only should a house be big enough and not too big, but its rooms need to be related to each other so as to save steps and lessen labor.

Physical and Mental Requisites for Flying

The exploits of Lindbergh and Chamberlin have attracted attention anew to the physical and mental factors concerned in aviation, says Hygeia Magazine, commenting editorially on their flight.

Continuous flying for from 40 to 50 hours makes a tremendous demand on the constitution, since it involves sleeplessness, relative starvation and constant concentration. In addition to these factors is the question of altitude and the ability of the body to meet the demands of the unusual environment.

Undoubtedly, a physical examination of a man who has just completed the terrific stress of a transoceanic flight would show much the same physical changes that occur in marathon runners or in workers who are compelled to maintain concentration for long periods of time.

Pecans

The bulk of the commercial production of pecans is at present in Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia and Florida. But the tree is native to river bottoms from Indiana and Iowa southwest into Mexico. Southeastern states and California have taken up pecan growing to some extent, but there has been little commercial success with these trees north of latitude 40 degrees.

The tree attains a height of 75 to 170 feet. The crop is harvested when the great majority of the nut husks have opened. As a rule it is disposed of before Thanksgiving.

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mrs. Annie Kwinski of 526 1st Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., writes that she became so weak and run-down that she was not able to do her housework. She saw the name Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the paper and said to her husband, "I will try that medicine and see if it will help me." She says she took six bottles and is feeling much better.

Mrs. Mattie Adams, who lives in Downing Street, Brewton, Ala., writes as follows: "A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and since taking it I feel like a different woman."

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grand-children, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

Thousands of women past fifty, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and are recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

HER PLAN WORKED OUT SPLENDIDLY

(© by D. J. Walsh.)

IF ANYBODY had told Edith Kent as she sat dawdling over a late breakfast that morning that she would receive an invitation to dine with Mrs. Jasper French that evening she would not have believed it, for, although Mrs. French had always taken pains to be gracious to Edith, her friendliness had never gone so far as an invitation to dine.

Edith was having a holiday. Her employer had been called unexpectedly out of town and the office would be closed for a day or two. That was why Edith was enjoying a leisurely breakfast instead of hurrying to her work. It was a real treat, for in Edith's life, since her parents' death, there had been all too few times that she could idle away a bit of time. She was a wage earner and had only recently arrived at a time where her earnings made it possible for her to have two rooms in which to work out a semblance to a home for herself. True, to most people her home, as she called it, would have seemed poor enough, but to Edith, long used to hall bedrooms, this sunny room, with its couchbed, tea wagon and few pieces of ancient furniture, seemed a paradise.

It is true that Edith did not expect to pass an idle day, for there were stockings to darn, her office suit to be sponged and pressed, and a new recipe for sponge-cake, which she wished to try. Therefore, when Mrs. Hess, who owned the house in which Edith had her "home," came toiling up the stairs to announce in a wheezy voice, "Phone, Miss Kent," Edith had no idea what was in store for her.

When Edith had taken down the receiver and called, "Hello!" she received the announcement that it was Mrs. French, and that she wished Edith to dine with her at six that evening. "Perfectly informal," Mrs. French assured Edith. "Only Miss Gordon and my nephew, Harry Case, whom you already know. Afterward we will have a game or two of cards." At Edith's ready acceptance Mrs. French murmured a conventional phrase or two and said good-by.

Edith was in the seventh heaven of delight. To dine with Mrs. Jasper French, who up to this time had merely been pleasantly neighborly. To dine and spend an evening in Mrs. French's cozy home, which from the glimpses Edith had caught through the lighted windows as she passed to and from her work must be lovely. To meet the beautiful Miss Constance Gordon, whom she had long admired, but never met, and to be in the presence of Harry Case, whom she had known since their school days, but had seen little of since. Edith's heart fairly danced for joy. She pinched herself to make sure she was awake and not dreaming.

Upstairs she flew. There would not be a moment to waste. The organdie must be put through the dye bath and pressed, her hair brushed until it shone. Oh, there was much to be done before she would be presentable. And all the time she worked her heart sang a merry little accompaniment to the grateful thoughts which danced through her mind at the kindness of Mrs. French in asking her—little Edith Kent—to her house.

At a quarter before six, when Edith ran down the street toward Mrs. French's house, she was still joyously happy. Snowflakes were falling and Edith laughingly held up her face to their caress. What a wonderful world it was! Forgotten were the sorrows and troubles which had beset her nineteen years. Tonight she would be happy.

A trim maid admitted Edith and showed her to the parlor where Mrs. French and Miss Gordon, who had already arrived, were seated before the fireplace talking. As Edith entered the room Mrs. French arose and in a delightful, cordial manner welcomed her, and taking her hand led her to the fire and introduced her to Miss Gordon. For a moment Edith was quite speechless. Never before had she seen anything so perfectly lovely as Miss Gordon. Miss Gordon might have been thirty. At any rate, she had the air of sophistication which is so fascinating to nineteen. She was blond and far more beautiful than nature had intended her to be. Though of this Edith was unaware. She, too, wore a pink gown, but of a shade that could not be bought for ten cents at the corner drug store. It was satin—one of those gowns that defy imitation and empty one's purse to buy. It had cost nearly as much as Edith could have earned in a whole year.

Soon after Edith's entrance, the maid ushered in another guest; this time it was Harry Case. From that time on things became very interesting, indeed.

Harry Case was a fine, manly looking fellow of twenty-one. He had finished college and was spending a year working in his father's office learning what he could of the business before entering the firm as a partner.

The dinner which followed was perfect in every detail. Edith, completely absorbed in the pleasure of her first really fine dinner party, was unconscious of anything save her own enjoyment. She was simply an attractive young girl, beautiful, as youth is always beautiful, and her lack of self-consciousness enhanced her charm, but beside Miss Gordon she was as a tiny taper compared to an incandescent light. Mrs. French, however, saw that every attention was showered impartially upon her guests and she also seemed to be thoroughly enjoying herself.

When the guests returned to the parlor Miss Gordon seated herself upon a big gray davenport and, patting the seat by her side, said to Edith:

"Come, my dear; sit beside me. Let us get acquainted."

Under the bright light which the chandelier threw directly on their faces Edith looked like a pink rosebud, while Miss Gordon, with her touched-up skin and penciled eyebrows, looked decidedly artificial. Harry Case, who had seated himself directly facing the two girls, looked from one to the other at first in surprise and then in growing conviction. Miss Gordon was in her liveliest mood and all went well until Mrs. French was called to the telephone. Then Miss Gordon's wit seemed to vent itself on poor Edith, who was bewildered by the change in the woman's manner. The fifteen minutes which followed were the most uncomfortable that Edith had ever endured. She felt she was being dissected for Harry's benefit, but she endured it all politely. She was, however, glad almost to tears when Mrs. French returned to the room and the maid brought in the card table. The bad quarter of an hour had done its work and left Edith with the joy of the evening dimmed.

At ten Miss Gordon decided it was time for her to go home, and to Mrs. French's offer of her car Miss Gordon shook her head and with an arch look at Harry Case said she preferred to walk. But Harry failed to catch the look and, turning to Edith, he asked her if he might walk home with her.

Thus the party left the house, Miss Gordon laughing merrily and insisting that she had had a most delightful evening, "dear Mrs. French," but with scarcely a good-night to Harry and Edith, who walked away while she was still saying good-by to her hostess.

As Mrs. French turned from the door and reached to turn off the lights she caught sight of herself in the long mirror over the fireplace and smiled at her reflection. Her little plan had worked very nicely, and Harry's career was safe in the hands of Edith and all she stood for. It had been a daring thing to do, but Harriet French loved her nephew as if he were her own son. She had resolved that he would not become involved in an affair which would hinder or complicate his future. She had been troubled by the growing friendship between Miss Gordon and Harry, for he was at the age where his fancy might be caught by the charm of an older woman. She was sure Miss Gordon was only amusing herself, but to Harry it might be serious enough to spoil his future. Therefore the risk was too great—hence the dinner party.

Mrs. French switched off the lights and ascended the stairs to her room, humming happily to herself.

Force of Environment Superior to Heredity

Take any newborn American youngster into the interior of China and give him over to the exclusive care of a Chinese family, and he will develop flawless Chinese, wear a queue, worship his ancestors, eat with chopsticks, sit on a mat, John B. Watson writes, in Harper's Magazine.

He will learn the Chinese scale of music (very different from our own, since they have a smaller number of notes than we have), develop very different rhythms and accents in music than we have in the West. What has become of his western trait inheritances from his jazz-proficient, piano-playing mother and from his cubist modernist-in-art father? Gone like the snows of yesteryear.

His behavior, his capabilities, what he will do, will be determined by his family life—by the patterns he finds there, by the accidents of that environment, and by the special emotional fixation of the one or the other of his (adopted) parents.

In the light of what we know we can do with the human infant (and undo and spoil) at an early age, we are no longer willing to make accurate observations upon it. Heredity in the sense both of instincts and of inborn traits, dispositions, capabilities, tendencies, constitution must go until other facts are produced to substantiate it.

Napoleon's First Wife

Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon Bonaparte, was born in the island of Martinique, a French possession in the West Indies. Her first husband was Viscount Beauharnois, by whom she had two children, Eugene, who became viceroy of Italy, and Hortense, wife of Napoleon's brother and mother of Louis Napoleon or Napoleon III. Napoleon divorced Josephine in 1809 in order that he might marry Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria. Josephine died in 1814.

Tested and Labeled

"How old are you?" inquired the visitor of his host's little son.

"That is a difficult question," answered the young man, removing his spectacles and wiping them reflectively. "The latest personal survey available shows my psychological age to be twelve, my moral age four, my anatomical age seven, and my physiological age six. I suppose, however, that you refer to my chronological age, which is eight. That is so old-fashioned that I seldom think of it any more."—Success Magazine.

If you are planning to trade-in your present car for a new car, remember these facts:

1. When you trade-in your used car for a new car, you are after all making a purchase, not a sale. You are simply applying your present car as a credit toward the purchase price of the new car.
2. Your used car has only one fundamental basis of value; i. e., what the dealer who accepts it in trade can get for it in the used car market.
3. Your used car has seemingly different values because competitive dealers are bidding to sell you a new car.
4. The largest allowance is not necessarily the best deal for you. Sometimes it is; sometimes it is not.
5. An excessive allowance may mean that you are paying an excessive price for the new car in comparison with its real value.
6. First judge the merits of the new car in comparison with its price, including all delivery and finance charges. Then weigh any difference in allowance offered on your used car.

Revenue From "Hobos"

That hoboes by no means are all penniless travelers is seen in the experience of the Denver & Rio Grande Western railroad in collecting more than $18,000 in fares from 5,233 "head-end" passengers and freight-train riders last year. The special agents of the road arrested nearly 28,500 men of this class, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. Those who had money were taken to the ticket office and instructed to purchase tickets.

Old folks take vacations for rest; young folks need their rest after they get back.

Every home should have its hermitage within its walls for silence and meditation.

"Aren't I" or "Ain't I"

George Bernard Shaw is quoted as being out to put an end to the "damnable affectation" of present-day English writers who see an evidence of culture in using "aren't I" instead of "am I not." "Aren't," says the writer quoted, is plural and "I" is singular. You would not say "Are I not right," would you? Then why use the plural form in the contraction. The homely form "ain't" is much more nearly correct, being derived directly from "amn't," the contraction of "am not."

Everything is forgiven except being called a snob; probably because it's true.

Doing good without publicity loses one important effect: setting an example for others.

The Green Cloak

By Yorke Davis

HAVE you in your travels or in your reading of the South Seas ever heard of the death chant of the Maoris, and do you know its significance? It forms the basis of the plot in this extremely fascinating mystery story. In this case the chant was not heard in faraway New Zealand, but in an American inland city. Read of the amazing double-personality of the girl who wore the green cloak.

Telephone Men Repair Lines

A large crew of men of the Garden Valley Telephone Company has been working between here and Grygla this week rebuilding their telephone line and repairing some of the lines in this village. Maybe in the near future, if the outlook is good, it would be a good stunt to sell the new company the phone lines around here so that there would be someone to keep them from turning into cow-pasture fence, as is the case with several lines right now, according to information received here. Let's have better phones, folks. You can't get service on a line that's down and in poor shape.

While mowing hay late Monday afternoon, Edgar Wegge had the misfortune of having two of the fingers on his left hand badly mangled when his glove got caught in the gear of the mower, pulling his fingers in between the gear wheels. He was taken to a hospital at Thief River Falls, where one finger was amputated between the first and second joint and the other, which was not crushed so badly, was trimmed off a little. Edgar is now on a forced vacation which he says is no good.

LOCATING THE FINANCIAL LEAKS THAT TAKE THE PROFITS OUT OF FARMING

By DAN H. OTIS

Director Agricultural Commission, American Bankers Association

INDUSTRIAL lines suffer because of inefficient firms, whose officers cling to old methods and place goods on the market, even at a loss, to compete with the more efficient institutions.

D. H. OTIS

Agriculture, too, has this problem to face. We find farmers who fight new methods. They retard the prosperity of other farmers by throwing on the market poor quality products, frequently produced at a loss.

The nature of the banker's business places him in a position to help this type of farmer as well as the more progressive farmer. At the same time the banker can assure himself of good loans based on the farm as a going concern.

A study of the investments, sources of income and expenses of the successful farmers in his community will give the banker a measuring stick by which to gage the hazard entailed in furnishing loans to other farmers. This study is readily accomplished through the use of summaries of farm records. In the absence of good records, survey blanks which can be obtained from the agricultural colleges, may be used for collecting the information.

A banker in a dairy district would use data similar to Farmer A's summary in the following table as a measuring stick to judge the condition of Farmer B:

	Farmer A	Farmer B
Farm receipts	$5,465	$2,214
Farm expenses	2,122	1,079
Rec'pts above expenses	$3,343	$1,135
Interest on total investment @ 5 per cent	1,070	989
Net income after deducting interest	$2,273	$146
Acres	127	130
Total investment	$21,400	$19,773
Operating capital (machinery, live stock, equipment)	5,862	4,473
Number of cows	18	11
Investment in cows	$2,302	$1,205

The total investment of Farmer A is moderate with a large percentage (27 per cent) of operating or working capital. Farmer B is low in operating capital. The number of cows is also low, which is reflected in the farm receipts, these being $3,251 less than those of Farmer A. The expenses of Farmer B, although about one-half of those of Farmer A, are, nevertheless, high in the ratio to receipts.

The only way to safeguard a loan to Farmer B is to consider assets and not income. Before any loan should be considered at all the banker and the farmer should go over the situation, uncover the leaks and outline a definite program of improvement.

Diversity of Business Good Sign

	Farmer A	Farmer B
Income from crops	$1,476	$851
From dairy products	2,343	752
Sale of livestock (including increased inventory)	1,656	280
Miscellaneous income	327	181

A good diversity of income serves to protect the farmer against years of over-production of any one farm product. Farmer A has a good diversity of income. Notice that the leading source of income, dairy products, constitutes less than one-half of the total income. The various enterprises that make up Farmer B's diversity of business all show marked decreased income.

Quality of Business Shows Leaks

	Farmer A	Farmer B
Receipts per cow	$130	$68
Receipts per livestock units other than cows	94	32

Under the heading, "Quality of Business," Farmer B shows that his cows are bringing in $62 less per year than Farmer A's. The $68 a year which they are producing is undoubtedly below the cost of feed and keep. The income per live-stock unit is still worse, and while this farm needs more cows to increase its volume of business, it would be financial suicide to invest in the same type of cow. This poor farmer must weed out his poor cows and feed the balance properly to get results before money is loaned to him to increase his herd with good stock.

An analysis of the farmer's records will bring out many other leaks which the farmer may not have noticed. He may be paying high prices for feed when less money spent for fertilizers and lime may enable him to raise the right kind of feed on his own farm and stop this drain on his pocketbook.

Barring temporary emergencies, farm loans handled on the basis of income, indicating a going concern, would hasten tremendously the day of a permanent and prosperous agriculture.

Gov't Inspector Hanna Here

W. J. Hanna, an inspector of the Interior Department, was here most of last week checking up on the claims of the MudLake homesteaders. Mr. Hanna went out to each one of the homesteaders who are still here and made a close investigation of the improvements in that locality for which the entrymen now have claims against the government under the Mud Lake Flat Bill.

Several of the other homesteaders who made entry in Mud Lake homestead land than those still residing there came here last week to check up on their improvements with Mr. Hanna. STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlister, famous in his special work,—applied psychology—employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of a recluse, Henry Morgan. With a young friend, who tells the story, and Ashton, assistant district attorney, who is working on the case, he outlines the tragedy while at dinner in The Meredith hotel.

CHAPTER II

No one could deny my old chief a sense of humor, but his possession of it did not always prevent him from taking literally a remark intended to be jocular. He waited in perfect silence until Ashton laid down his fish fork and took his first sip of coffee. Then he pounced upon him like a cat.

"So you want my help, do you? Well, I'm glad of that. I'm glad that at last there's a district attorney's office in this country advanced enough to use applied psychology in the detection of crime. I'm at your service absolutely. Phelps, here, and I will do all we can for you. But you must tell us all about the case first."

Ashton laughed. "I'm sorry to disappoint you, but the fact is that when I spoke of wanting your help, I was not thinking of you as a psychologist, but as a New Zealander."

Doctor McAlister frowned.

"What has my being a New Zealander to do with it?"

"Why," said Ashton, "we found some bundles of old newspapers and various other odds-and-ends which seemed to point to Morgan having lived at one time in Wellington, and knowing that you had spent all the early years of your life in those parts, it occurred to me that you might have some connection there which would assist us in tracing him."

"Of course," growled the doctor, "I'll do anything I can for you."

Partly to appease him and partly because the subject was running strongly in his own mind, Ashton talked about little else than the Oak Ridge mystery during all the while we sat at dinner.

"The papers will make a great sensation tomorrow morning," he said, "of the testimony at the inquest of a young man named Harvey. I wish we might have got hold of him before that fool of a coroner did. His testimony sounded like a choice selection of pages from the 'Old Sleuth,' and I am inclined to think that it has just about as much relation to fact. I left Mallory—he's one of the detectives in our office—out in Oak Ridge to keep an eye on him. He's to bring him down to the office in the morning. Until I have questioned him pretty thoroughly, I sha'n't know whether to believe a word of his tale, or not. Mallory seems half inclined to think that the boy has some active connection with the crime, but that I disbelieve utterly."

"Tell us about him," said the doctor.

"Why, he's a young fellow well known there in town. His parents are eminently pious and respectable, but Willie enjoys the reputation of being a little fast. He's one of these imitation college boys, very well pleased with himself and quite a lady-killer, I judge, from the snickers that went round the room when he testified that he had gone out to call on a young lady and had not found her at home.

"I am telling you all that because it throws something of a light on his testimony. He swore that as he passed the house about nine o'clock, he noticed a light in the upper windows. The shades were down, he said, and in silhouette on one of them he could see old Morgan leaning back in a chair in an unnatural attitude, and with something queer-looking around his throat. That would be interesting enough, and may be true, but hear what he piles onto it. He says he saw the shadow of another figure on the shade, the figure of a woman, who was leaning over Morgan and making strange gestures in the air."

"Well," said the doctor, "may not that be true, too?"

"He might have made us think so if he had stopped there," said Ashton, "but his subsequent testimony made it perfectly clear that he was lying. He told the coroner that after watching that lighted window shade for a few moments, he had walked away and gone straight home, and that was all he knew about it. Then the coroner questioned him more closely as to the appearance of the woman. He described her very fully. He said she was young, pretty, dark, and that she wore a green cloak with a high turned-up collar; and yet, mind you, he had just testified that he had only seen her in silhouette upon a window shade.

"That thick-witted deputy coroner seemed to find nothing extraordinary in this description, and did not ask him how he could distinguish black hair from blond, or a green cloak from a yellow by its shadow. And not one of his precious jurors inquired about it, either. So his testimony went entirely unchallenged. Of course I could have spoken up, but I was only too glad to let the thing go until tomorrow morning, when I shall have the young man to myself."

I could see by the wrinkles about the doctor's eyes that his good humor was returning. "So it's perfectly clear to you, is it," he asked, "that this young man, according to his lights, wasn't telling the exact truth? You rail at the coroner and his jury, you people who walk in darkness and might see a great light and won't. Haven't you any category in your mind at all between truth and lies? Don't you allow for any margin of illusion?"

"Illusion!" Ashton snorted. "Do you really believe that a man could testify as Harvey did, in perfectly good faith? Do you believe a sane man's mind could play him a trick like that? What was there to give him illusions?"

"Association," said Doctor McAlister bluntly. "The profile he saw in silhouette was associated, in his mind, with some woman with black hair, and the high-collared cloak connected itself in his mind with some cloak of the same shape that he had previously seen, which happened to be green in color. Consequently, he thought of the woman whose shadow he saw upon the shade as a black-haired woman with a green cloak."

It was clear to me that Ashton had been impressed with the reasonableness of Doctor McAlister's explanations, and yet he was unwilling to admit to himself that the impression had been made. Before he could think of any comment that would be sufficiently noncommittal, Doctor McAlister changed the subject.

"You've searched the house pretty thoroughly, I suppose," he said. "Have you found anything besides that vaguely suggested connection with New Zealand that places your man at all? Have you any indication how he passed the time? What sort of books he read, if he read at all, or what he did to amuse himself?"

"He had one queer hobby," said Ashton, "and that was geography. He had literally hundreds of maps, large scale maps of the whole of the southern Pacific."

I saw my chief's eyes light up at that, and waited, with a good deal of interest, for what he meant to say to this rather unpromising looking clew. But just then we were interrupted.

Wilkins came up and bent over his chair. "Doctor Reinhardt has telephoned to you, sir," he said. "Shall I put an instrument on the table?"

"Thank you, Wilkins. Yes, I'll talk with Doctor Reinhardt right here."

A moment later a portable telephone was set down beside the doctor's coffee cup. When he had hung up the receiver, and motioned to a waiter to take the telephone away, he turned to me—

"Reinhardt says he's got a queer case out at St. Martin's. He wants me to come out, posthaste, and have a look at it. You'll go with me, won't you? From what he says, it may prove interesting."

I nodded assent, and we both rose from the table.

"You'll excuse us, won't you?" said Doctor McAlister to Ashton. "Look me up in the morning and I'll give you those addresses."

Ashton rose, too. "I suppose you wouldn't care to take me over to the hospital with you?" he hazarded.

My chief looked a little surprised, and, perhaps, for an instantaneous moment, he hesitated; but then he said heartily: "Why, we'd be glad to have you come. Reinhardt won't object, I'm sure, only I'm afraid you may find us rather dull company when we get going on our hobbies."

"I'll go with you as far as the hospital, anyway," Ashton said. "I'd like your company, and, if possible, I'd like to get this confounded murder out of my head for an hour or two. And if you find you don't want a layman about when it comes to examining the patient, why I can wait outside."

It had occurred to me when Ashton expressed his wish to forget the Oak Ridge murder for an hour or two, that he was choosing his company badly in offering to go out to the hospital with us, but I soon found I was mistaken. My chief seemed as little anxious as his guest to discuss the subject that was in all our minds. But it was the late Henry Morgan who provided us with a topic of conversation after all. The suggestion that he might have lived in New Zealand set the doctor off in reminiscence about his own early days spent in that part of the world.

"That was a great country for a boy to spend his childhood in," he said presently, "at least in the days when I was a youngster. That was during the gold rush, you know. They were finding it everywhere. And a wild lot of men they were. And if we had gold hunters ashore, we had pirates, and famous ones, too, afloat. Why, I myself saw Bully Franklin once."

"Was he a pirate?" Ashton inquired politely, but with no great interest.

"Was he a pirate! Well, what does fame amount to? He was a pirate that a British cruiser once spent a whole year looking for, tramping up and down the Pacific on the wildest goose chase that ever a cruiser led."

I was rather glad to get the doctor to talking of something besides the murder, so I pushed along on this topic. "I suppose he got what was coming to him, at last," I remarked.

"Well, I don't know; not poetic justice, certainly. Nothing like what his crimes called for. He was killed as the result of a love affair of his. He made love to a Maori girl that one of his men was interested in, and it's said the fellow bashed his head with a tiller one night as he was coming aboard, up over the side. His crew went all to pieces after that. The authorities got hold of most of them and hanged them in short order."

"How did you happen to see him?" I asked. "I should think a pirate would be rather a difficult man to come to close quarters with."

"Let's see," he answered reflectively. "It was when we were living at Hokitiki. My father was manager of a branch of the Union bank there. Franklin put into the harbor and came ashore. I was only a lad then, and a good deal disappointed that he hadn't a long black mustache and a pair of pistols in his belt. He probably had the pistols somewhere, but they didn't show, and he was mild looking enough."

Then he turned suddenly to Ashton. "How old a man did you say this Morgan was?"

"A man apparently about sixty."

"Well, if he was out in that part of the world when I was, he was old enough to have had a rather lively time."

Our cab pulled up at the door to the hospital just then, and we found Doctor Reinhardt waiting for us in the office.

"I don't know whether it is a case that will interest you, or not," he said, "but it's rather curious. She was picked up for drunk, half frozen, out of the gutter by a patrolman. He rang up the wagon and they took her to the police station, but the desk sergeant disagreed with the diagnosis, and sent her here. Gilbert was on duty when they brought her in, about two o'clock this morning, and he thought it was concussion of the brain. For myself, I don't believe it. I'd say, to look at her, that she's normally asleep, except that we can't wake her. She's queer looking; pretty, in a sort of outlandish way. When I last looked at her she was mumbling the queerest gibberish you ever heard. I've got a nodding acquaintance with most of the languages that come in here, but I never heard anything that sounded at all like this."

"Come along," said Doctor McAlister; "I'd like to take a look at her."

Doctor Reinhardt made no objection to Ashton's accompanying us, so together we followed him into the long white ward. The girl we found lying upon the narrow cot, beside which we stopped, justified his description of her. She was not at all a beauty, according to our standards, but the thought came to me that in some far-off corner of the world where standards were different, she might have been accounted so, possibly in a supreme degree.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Nickel Pinchers Not Exponents of Thrift

I have never known a stingy person who was nice, who was one of those persons the thought of whom makes your heart expand with warmth and affection. I am not inveighing against those who are sensibly economical and thrifty. When a man or woman says: "No, I can't afford that. It's only a dollar, but a dollar is important to me," that is all right. The quality of being unashamed transfigures almost anything into something all right, even charming.

But a stingy person tries to pretend that the expense is nothing; that isn't what interests him. Oh, no! Yet his worry over the slipping away of nickels is so intense in him that it makes your flesh creep. When there is a restaurant check to be paid, when you invite a tightwad to have a soda with you, click, click, you intuitively feel the cerebrations going on in his anxious brain as to which of you will have to give up the mazuma for the indulgence.

"I don't want to embarrass them by taking them to the Ritz," the very rich girl rationalizes her economy, "so I will just take them down to that interesting little place under the elevated, with the sawdust on the floor."

"I don't want persons to get to care for me only for my money," says the very rich snob who as often as not is the richest debutante of the season. So she always makes it a point to "go Dutch."—Elizabeth Barbour in the Saturday Evening Post.

The Last Survivor
Flyosan has killed all his millions of friends and relatives

NO WONDER he's blue. He knows he's next.

Flyosan has killed every single fly and mosquito in thousands of homes this summer. Flyosan is the modern best way of fighting flying pests. It kills them by the wholesale—not one at a time.

Flyosan is the original liquid insect spray (non-poisonous). Use Flyosan itself, not one of its imitations. Flyosan not only kills all the flies and mosquitoes in your home but also rids it of the millions of deadly, disease-bearing germs which each one carries.

"Swatting" only scatters these germs into the air which you and your family breathe.

Here is the right insecticide for each insect:

FLYOSAN, Liquid Spray—kills flies and mosquitoes.
PETERMAN'S ANT FOOD—exterminates ants.
PETERMAN'S DISCOVERY, Liquid—exterminates bed-bugs.
PETERMAN'S ROACH FOOD—exterminates that cockroach army.
PETERMAN'S MOTH FOOD—protects against moths.

You must have a specific insecticide for each insect. No single insecticide will exterminate them all. We have had nearly 50 years' experience. We know that is true.

Peterman's has the right insecticide for each insect. On sale wherever drugs are sold.

BE IT RESOLVED that all dogs be assessed at $3.00 each.

Commissioner Ole Torgerson offered the following resolution in writing and moved its adoption:

BE IT RESOLVED that all sheep three months old and over be assessed at $2.00 per head.

Commissioner A. S. Rokke seconded the motion and the same being put, received a majority of the votes of the members of the County Board and was duly carried and was by the Chairman then presiding so declared.

Commissioner A. S. Rokke offered the following resolution in writing and moved its adoption:

It appearing the the 1927 Personal Property Assessment in the township of Vega is unjust and inequitable as between that town and other townships in this county and upon an inspection of the returns of the assessor for said Vega township it is apparent to this board that the assessor has not included all of the personal property located in said town in his return, and the total value of personal property assessed in said town being to this board apparently greatly overvalued, and results in a discrimination between the town of Vega and other townships in said county, and the board believing that a great quantity of personal property has been omitted by the assessor,

BE IT RESOLVED that the county board requests the State Tax Commission to cause the personal property of said Vega Township to be re-assessed.

Commissioner Ole Torgerson seconded the motion and the same being put, received a majority of the votes of the members of the County Board and was duly carried and was by the Chairman then presiding so declared.

On motion adjourned sine die.

Live Stock Industry Grows to be One of Important Sources of Income

Cattle, Horses, Hogs and Sheep Bring Many Dollars In Revenue During the Year.

From a very modest beginning sixty years ago, the livestock industry in Minnesota has grown into one of the largest activities in the state, from the farmer's standpoint, until in the year 1926, Minnesota livestock was more profitable than grain crops to the average farm.

This is remarkable, when it is considered that in 1867 there were only 100,000 cows on Minnesota farms. With more than one million, five hundred thousand cows now on farms, Minnesota farm owners last year marketed $166,008,385 of livestock.

M. J. Holmberg, of St. Paul, Commissioner of Agriculture for Minnesota, in compiling information for his 1927 report, submitted the following detailed data upon Minnesota livestock production:

The year 1926 for producers of Minnesota livestock was more profitable than for the grain crops. The aggregate gross farm value of all classes was $257,619,000, compared with $257,413,000 one year ago, or a slight decrease. The value of livestock marketed in 1926 totaled $166,008,395, compared with $142,095,045 marketed in 1925. Combining the two, the total value for 1926 was $423,127,395 and in 1925 it was $399,508,045, a gain of $23,619,350.

Reports made by stockyards and packing plants of livestock originating in Minnesota and sold for the years 1926 and 1925 are as follows:

1926	No. Head	Value
Cattle	735,563	$ 40,480,210
Calves	690,306	8,034,296
Sheep	379,167	3,998,718
Swine	4,543,189	113,495,181
Total		$166,008,395

1925	No. Head	Value
Cattle	612,456	$ 32,156,146
Calves	619,925	6,666,276
Sheep	281,011	2,829,115
Swine	4,3372,370	100,443,598
Total		$142,095,045

The total farm value of all crops in 1926 was estimated to be $327,008,000, compared with $372,062,000 for 1925, or a decline in gross farm value of $45,054,000. The 1926 combined value of crops, livestock marketed and livestock on farms at the end of the year was estimated at $750,135,000, compared with $771,570,000 for the previous year, approximately $21,435,000 less. However, one must bear in mind that a portion of the crops produced in 1925 were marketed in 1926 and a share of the crop production of 1926 will be sold during 1927.

HORSES AND COLTS: Horses on Minnesota farms have decreased since 1918, when they reached their peak. The use of automobiles and tractors, no doubt, has been the main factor in causing this decrease. During the last two years, however, there has been an increase in the colt population and if kept up a few years, so that it will offset the older horses dying or being sold, there again will be shown an increase. In 1870 there were 102,500 horses on farms. The number was increased each year until in 1880 there were 274,500 head on farms. The number had grown in 1900 to 459,673 and by 1918 there were 950,000 horses on farms. There was no change in 1919 but every year since then the number on farms has been decreasing until on January 1, 1927, there were only 810,000, or about 4,000 more than in 1912. There are many who believe that the surplus production of oats should be used on the farms as feed for horses, and in this way a slightly higher price maintained for that part of the crop to be sold; also, that it is cheaper for farmers to raise colts and provide their own motive power than to purchase. The farm value of the 810,000 horses and colts on Minnesota farms January 1, 1927, was estimated to be $62,645,000, compared with 827,000 head on farms January 1, 1926, and a farm value of $66,733,000.

MULES AND MULE COLTS: Mules on farms apparently have never been popular in this state. This perhaps may be attributed somewhat to the fact that not many people from the southern states came to Minnesota and settled on farms. In 1867 there were only 955 mules on farms. Since then there has been a slight yearly increase, until on January 1, 1927, there were 14,000 head reported with a farm value of $1,092,000, compared with 13,000 head January 1, 1926, and a farm value of $1,030,000.

ALL CATTLE: Based on all cattle on farms, which includes cows and heifers 2 years old and over being kept for milk, Minnesota ranks sixth in the United States. This, of course, is due to the fact that she is one of the leading dairy states.

Approximately 65 per cent of all cattle on Minnesota farms are potentially milk cows; that is, cows and heifers 2 years old and over plus heifers 1 to 2 years old and heifer calves being kept for milk cows. Some idea of the growth of the cattle industry in this state can be understood when it is known that in 1867 there were only 263,290 cattle on farms, while on January 1, 1927, there were 2,739,000 head of all cattle on farms. The value of cattle on farms January 1, 1867, was estimated to be $6,143,933, compared with $125,165,000 January 1, 1927. However, due to a rather unfavorable season which caused short pasturage the number on hand January 1, 1927, showed a slight decrease from 1926 when there were 2,853,000 head on farms with a value of $123,114,000.

MILK COWS AND HEIFERS: This classification includes all milk cows and heifers 2 years old and over kept for milk, but does not include heifers from 1 to 2 years old and heifer calves being kept for milk cows. Minnesota, from a dairy standpoint, has made wonderful progress during the last 60 years. Based on number of milk cows on farms January 1, 1927, Minnesota ranks second in the United States, being exceeded only by Wisconsin which had 2,014,000, while Minnesota had 1,529,000. New York comes third with 1,318,000 and Iowa fourth with 1,314,000; Illinois is next with only 988,000. In other words, 7 per cent of all the milk cows in the United States are on Minnesota farms. In the year 1867 or 60 years ago, there were only 100,507 cows on Minnesota farms, but there has been a steady increase until the last three years. The great impetus to the dairy industry occurred in 1907, when the number had increased to 1,019,700. The farm value of the 1,529,000 cows and heifers on farms January 1, 1927, was estimated to be $93,263,000, compared with 1,560,000 on farms January 1, 1926, and a farm value of $92,040,000.

HEIFERS 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD KEPT FOR MILK COWS: While there was some depletion in milk cows, due perhaps to poor crops and lack of sufficient feed as well as poor pasturage last summer, Minnesota farmers have not lost faith in the milk cow as an economic stabilizer, because it is estimated that on January 1, 1927, there were 321,000 heifers from 1 to 2 years old on farms, compared with 300,000 January 1, 1926 and 306,000 January 1, 1925.

SHEEP AND LAMBS: During the past two years, especially in 1926, sheep raising in Minnesota has made rapid progress. Activities of railroads, credit corporations and county agents, no doubt, played a great part in bringing about this increase. Sheep are being put on farms in sections of the state where weeds have gained a stronghold with the hope that these animals will aid in their elimination or, at least, place them under control. The 670,000 sheep and lambs on farms January 1, 1927, is the largest number that has been reported on January 1 of any year. Previous to that time the banner year was 1919, when 642,000 sheep were reported on farms. Sixty years ago there were only 130,314 sheep reported on farms with a farm value of $350,715, while the 670,000 head on farms January 1, 1927, had a farm value of $6,529,000. It was estimated that on January 1, 1926, there were 540,000 sheep and lambs on farms with a farm value of $6,056,000.

WOOL PRODUCTION: With the increase in sheep on Minnesota farms the past two years the production of wool also has shown quite an increase. The five-year (1919-1923) average was 2,547,000 pounds, while in 1925 it was 3,294,000 and for 1926 the production was estimated to be 3,392,000 pounds. Based on the December 15 average price for Minnesota's unwashed wool, as reported to the Division of Crop and Livestock Estimates, the farm value of the 1926 production was $1,085,440, compared with $1,185,840 in 1925.

SWINE: The swine industry has made great strides in Minnesota during the past sixty years. In 1867 the number reported on farms January 1 was 144,302. While there was a rather steady increase the first big increase came in 1901 when the number on farms had increased to 1,309,620. The number reached 2,075,000 in 1917 and in 1923 it was estimated to be 3,650,000. On January 1, 1927, the number on farms was estimated to be 3,525,000 with a farm value of $61,688,000, compared with 3,456,000 head January 1, 1926, and farm value of $60,480,000.

MINNESOTA CO-OPS DO IMMENSE ANNUAL BUSINESS

Minnesota co-operative organizations, covering a great diversity of farm crops, are doing an annual business of considerable magnitude. Annual reports of these organizations show that a total business of $95,405,024 was done by these institutions in 1926.

This large business was distributed as follows:

Land O' Lakes Creameries, Inc., $39,851,655.92; Central Co-operative Commission association, livestock, $40,908,878.74; Lake Region Egg and Poultry association, eggs and poultry, $2,779,276.18; Minnesota Cheese Producers, cheese, $801,778.76; Minnesota Wheat Growers, wheat, $2,083,659.14; Minnesota Co-operative Wool Marketing association, wool, $600,000.00; Twin City Milk Producers, milk and products, $8,379,776.74.

A considerable amount of Minnesota livestock was sold at Chicago through the Chicago Producers, a terminal co-operative, to which breeders in the southeast part of Minnesota annually ship many cars of cattle, hogs and sheep. Minnesota farmers also ship livestock to the Sioux City market, through the Sioux City Producers, also a co-operative, which gets receipts from southwestern Minnesota.

STATE HAS MANY AUTOS

Automobile ownership in Minnesota during the last five years has doubled. During 1927, the owners of close to 700,000 automobiles will pay to the state a total of $10,000,000 in motor vehicle registration taxes. In the year 1921, the owners of 332,652 automobiles paid $5,616,616 to the state for motor vehicle registration.

Minnesota owners now have more than $350,000,000 invested in automobiles, which is $132,000,000 more than the Interstate Commerce Commission physical valuation of the railroads in Minnesota.

These auto owners during 1927 will spend more than $100,000,000 in the operation of these 700,000 Minnesota-owned cars and will travel more than three billion, five hundred million miles during the year.

In addition to the money expended for car operation, these auto owners will spend more than $75,000,000 for food and drink along Minnesota's 7,000-mile highway system while traveling.

SEAWAY PROJECT WILL HELP N.W.

St. Lawrence Waterways of Vital Interest To Minnesota's Future.

(NOTE—The objective of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, is herewith set forth in concise manner by Edward Jerome Dies, of Chicago, one of the best informed men in the nation on this particular subject.)

By EDWARD JEROME DIES

Out in Montana a corporation carrying on an international trade has made a striking discovery.

It can lay down its product in Indiana as cheaply by water and rail as it can by rail. In other words, it can send the product by rail to the western coast, by water through the Panama canal to the Atlantic seaboard, and then by rail back to Indiana at the same cost of shipping all-rail from Montana to Indiana.

That discovery is typical of thousands that are being made. And it explains in some measure why the middle west is steeped in the waterways problem.

A wave of sentiment in favor of waterways development is gaining great momentum. Bankers, manufacturers and agricultural leaders believe that the middle west and the northwest will swing into an era of vast development and undreamed of prosperity with the opening of inland water lanes.

Water Costs Lower

Take the case of a single manufacturer, the largest in his field. C. U. Williams is a member of the Mississippi Valley Association, which is making waterways history. He is also president of the Williams-Oil-O-Matic Heating Corporation of Bloomington, a short distance from Chicago. His employes, including salesmen, number thousands, his modern plant sprawls over acres of land, and his business spans the globe.

"A short time ago," he said, "we shipped an oil burner from Bloomington to Providence, R. I. On the very same day an oil burner was shipped from San Francisco by way of the Panama canal to the same man. The one sent by water from the western coast reached this man three days ahead of the one shipped by rail from Illinois. And the cost by water was three dollars less than the cost by rail.

"Such incidents might be cited without end. When the monetary losses due to absence of inland water channels are totaled up in a single industry the aggregate sum is so tremendous as to be startling.

"Manufacturing is shifting westword. The east is fast coming to the realization that the central west has everything in its favor, that geographically it is ideal for manufacturing purposes. All that remains to lift the central west and the northwest to new heights, industrially, is the opening of adequate waterways."

Need for greater and cheaper carrying facilities has been brought about by the fact that the centers of production are swinging to the west. Indiana is now the center of population; central Missouri is the center of farm acreage; Minnesota of iron ore production.

Fifteen years ago James J. Hill said the railroads should spend a billion dollars a year for five years in expansion of facilities. Five years later a group of experts reported that if traffic continued to increase for the succeeding ten years on the basis of the past twenty years, the railroads would be forced to spend one and a half billions of dollars a year to meet the demands of agricultural and industrial expansion. The soundness of such predictions is now being painfully realized.

A citizens' organization known as the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater association has been working steadily for years assembling information on the subject of providing the west and the middle west with an international waterway. It would make the great St. Lawrence basin navigable for ocean-going ships—from Duluth and the Minnesota wheat fields down the gulf of the St. Lawrence to the open sea.

Those fighting for the deep waterways project declare development of the Great Lakes in the last twenty years may be understood in some measure when it is considered that the traffic now exceeds in tonnage that of the Mediterranean and Black Seas combined. The tonnage is greatly enlarged by the amount of iron ore and wheat thus transported. And these commodities are factors to be considered, too, in connection with low freight rates. Yet the fact that even with the short season of the Great Lakes, more freight now passes through the "Soo" in a year than through the Suez Canal, remains a striking indication of the possibilities in fresh water commerce.

Briefly, the St. Lawrence seaway project consists in canalizing the St. Lawrence from Montreal, the present head of navigation, to Lake Ontario; building a canal around Niagara Falls, deepening the interlake rivers, and finally deepening and enlarging the lake harbor ports.

It has been suggested that the cost of canalizing the St. Lawrence should be equally divided between the governments of the United States and of Canada, and, in return, one-half of the developed horse power apportioned to each country. Engineers have reported that the returns from tonnage charges would maintain the canal and amortize the bonds. If the income from the canal were not sufficient, then the sale of the hydroelectric power would more than cover the cost.

Leaders of the project, who represent the vast industrial and agricultural interests solidified upon the movement, declare public sentiment from Ohio to Idaho is strongly in favor of the seaway and that such powerful, over-growing sentiment cannot long be ignored or denied.
